

Moving in

This fall, 4,400 students will live in on-campus housing. This is an increased number because of the larger capacity in the newly expanded Jardine Apartment Complex, said Bob Burgess, associate director of business operations for Housing and Dining Services. Check inside to find what options are available for those living on campus.

Dorm residents, renters should check policies before obtaining pets

By Mark Sibilla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Pets of any shape or size can be beneficial to students.

The presence of an animal within the same living space can help reduce stress, cause a pleasant distraction from studying and promote a sense of pride and responsibility within the owner.

But before one brings their furry, slithery or four-legged friends to their residence hall, apartment building or house, it is important for residents to learn the rules and regulations of pet ownership in that particular building lest they incur financial or disciplinary actions.

First Management Incorporated, a leasing firm in Manhattan, is pet friendly in all of its properties. First Management owns and manages Campus East Apartments, Chase Manhattan Apartments, Founder's Hill Apartments and Woodway Apartments.

"We allow one pet per apartment that is 30 pounds or less at mature weight," said Tinea Graves, leasing consultant.

To have a pet in an apartment owned by the company, people must register the pet with the management offices. The pet owner is then responsible for a $400 pet cost.

"The cost breaks down into a $200 fee and a $200 pet deposit," Graves said. "The fee is non-refundable, but the deposit is."

Graves said any damages that occur in the apartment because of the pet are taken from the $200 deposit.

If any residents have illegal pets — a pet that weighs more than the 30 pound limit or if the resident has more than one pet in the apartment — a warning is first delivered to the resident of the apartment, Graves said.

She said if the resident ignores the warning, a $100-per-pet-per-day penalty is instituted. If a resident continues to ignore the prompts to remove the pet, there is a possibility for eviction due to a breach of the rental contract, Graves said.

For those who choose to live in the residence halls on campus, K-State Housing and Dining services have a very specific policy regarding ownership of pets.

"Pets that normally live in a contained environment (gerbils, hamsters, harmless snakes, white rats, birds and fish) are permitted, but only with the prior approval of your roommate and residence life coordinator," according to the Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls policy handbook.

According to the handbook, students should not bring pet to the residence halls without prior approval. One can acquire approval by filling out a pet registration form available through the front desk of the residence hall, the resident assistant or the residence life coordinator.

Sometimes a management firm's pet policy for an apartment can prevent a person from owning the pet they want.

Eryn Forbes, first-year student in veterinary medicine, said her apartment complex only allows caged animals and animals that can be contained such as hamsters, small rabbits, fish or small reptiles.

"I would really like a dog — something like a Great Dane — but that is not realistic right now," Forbes said.

She said she does not think small animals are worth owning, because they do not offer as much opportunity for companionship.

"I think it would be nice to have a large dog, especially since I am in vet school. A dog would be useful for me to practice things like listening to its heartbeat or studying its practical anatomy and physiology," Forbes said. "But right now, I am fine without a big dog — I can wait until I get a larger house or apartment that allows them."

In general, it is best to ask about the acceptability and policies of pets before moving them into a living space.

SHOPPING SHUTTLE

Shuttled to shop

Students without cars ride K-State shuttle to buy necessities

By Salena Strate
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With no public transportation available in Manhattan, there is still a way for students without cars to buy groceries.

Two pick-up locations are designated to shuttle students on campus. This shuttle takes any K-State student to two spots: Wal-Mart or the International Food Store.

The shopping shuttle service is specifically designed for international students who do not have the means of transportation other students have, said Pat Caruso, assistant coordinator at Jardine Apartment Complex.

The shuttle, which is a van sponsored by the Office of International Programs and Jardine, picks up students at Frith Community Center and the K-State Student Union. The only requirement for use of the shuttle is to show a valid student ID.

Caruso and other coordinators of the shopping shuttle are looking to add a third pick-up location near the residence halls.

idence halls.

"We have such a large international student participation in the halls that adding a pick-up spot there would be something I would change," said Ty Krueger, assistant coordinator for apartment living at Jardine.

Krueger, graduate student in college student personnel, was the summer shuttle director. He said an average of 20-30 students used the shuttle this summer, mainly to shop for groceries and toiletries. The shuttle has run every week for four years, but Krueger said the summer schedule runs every two weeks.

Students have from 9 a.m. to noon to shop at both locations. At the end of the scheduled time, the shuttle takes all students to their home or residence hall.

"You get to know Manhattan pretty well after taking everybody home," Krueger said. "Another challenge is the manpower when trying to staff for the shuttle."

The next date scheduled for the shuttle to run is Aug. 18.

Krueger said another purpose of the shopping shuttle is for international students to experience U.S. culture.

"Students that participate get to know other people in the same culture (but they might not live in the same place)," he said. "I see a lot of students talk in the shuttle and see them creating more relationships outside of where they live."

Reiko Shirato, junior in accounting, said she used the shuttle twice in her first years at K-State.

Reiko said especially in the first year, she thought more store options and public transportation would have been nice.

"At that point I didn't have any transportation, just the shuttle bus, because I didn't have a lot of friends so I should have used it to (do) whatever," Shirato said.

During the colder weather, Shirato said she did not want to walk to the Union to be picked up by the shuttle. She said it would have been easier to be picked up in the residence hall parking lot or at Moore Hall.

Storage solutions

Maximize personal closet space by using rollaway bins, accessory racks, shoe caddies

There is something that plagues the K-State student body at the beginning of each semester, sending students and parents into fits of Target and Wal-Mart shopping sprees.

It is closet organization, and it is almost always an issue.

The female fashionista is worried her closet will not hold her car loads of shoes, the out-of-state student is nervous he will not have enough room for his flip-flops and winter coats, and the unsettled parent is concerned her child's room will soon turn into a sea of dirty laundry and month-old pizza boxes.

Fortunately, the cure for the frenzy is smart closet and storage organization.

Dorm closets are usually much smaller than what students are used to at home. Even apartment and rental-house closets tend to run a little on the narrow side, so strategic organization is key for every K-State student's room. Some of the best storage options are over-the-door racks and hanging shelves.

These shelves typically are made from reinforced fabric to eliminate sagging. Fashioned vertically, the storage cubes — there are usually four to six of them — hang from the closet's metal rod and face outward for easy access. T-shirts, jeans, socks, underwear, towels, sweatshirts, blankets and just about anything that will fold, fits securely into the shelves while leaving room for hangers.

Another great over-the-door option is a purse/storage rack. These racks come in all different shapes, sizes and hook numbers. They also are ideal for hats, scarves, belts, ties and light jackets. They fit well on the outside or inside of the door, depending on desired visibility.

Instead of taking up precious floor space with rows of sneakers and heels, suspended 24-pocket closet organizers are the perfect fit for stowing shoes. These canvas or plastic storage units hang from four hooks that slide between the ceiling and closet door, and they leave room for the next best storage option: rollaway bins.

Rollaway bins are available in various shapes and sizes, but are most commonly found as a 15-quart plastic storage unit with two to four separated drawers. Once again, these drawers are ideal for holding bedding, T-shirts, jeans, towels, etc., but are also great for stowing coats, bulky sweaters and winter blankets for the upcoming cold weather.

With these items, the closet might be close to reaching its capacity, but do not worry. There are tubs and bins available for clothes, shoes, and other odds and ends that fit perfectly underneath any standard sized bed. Even if a bed is too close to the carpet for these units, bed risers are inexpensive and easy to come by.

Collapsible laundry hampers also fit neatly under beds or in closet areas and are great for saving space. Accordion drying racks are best for hanging damp clothes. Easy to put up, take down and store, these drying racks are light yet sturdy and will not leave rust or wood marks on clothing.

Though these solutions might not cure the fly-ridden pizza boxes strewn across the floor, mom, dad, and student can all rest assured the too-small closet crisis can be solved.

PLACES TO KNOW

PICK UP STUDENT ID

The K-State ID Center is near the Union Food Court on the first floor of the K-State Student Union. If students do not already have their student IDs or need to have a lost or stolen ID replaced, they can go to this location.

ADD MONEY TO STUDENT ID (WILDCAT CASH)

Right outside this office is a machine students can use to add money to their IDs for Wildcat Cash. Another machine for students to add Wildcat Cash to their ID cards is located in the 24-hour study area in the lower level of Hale.

PAY TUITION

To make tuition payments, students can pay with cash or check in the Cashier's Office in Anderson 211. Tuition was due on Aug. 14, but many students have tuition payment plans set up. Students also can mail payments to the Controller's Office at P.O. Box 68, Manhattan, KS, 66505-0068. There are also ways to pay online with a credit card or directly from a bank account. See www.k-state.edu/controller/cashiers for more information.

PAY A PARKING TICKET

Parking on campus can be a pain, especially now that several lots are closed for parking-garage construction. However, there are still rules to follow, and these regulations are listed on the Parking Services Web site, www.ksu.edu/parking. To pay a parking ticket, students can drop it off at 108 Edwards Hall, mail it, or use any of several drop boxes around campus.

STAY ACTIVE

Peters Recreation Complex offers a variety of ways to stay active, including a natatorium, located on Denison Avenue near the Old Stadium, and a variety of outdoor facilities like volleyball and tennis courts. Intramurals are a popular way to get involved, and there are several clubs as well. The main complex is located north of most of the campus on Denison Avenue. For more information and the hours the rec is open, see recservices.ksu.edu.

STAY HEALTHY
Lafene Health Center is a fully accredited, professionally staffed clinic that is funded by the health privilege fee included in your tuition, according to www.k-state.edu/lafene. It is located on the west side of campus on Sunset Avenue, and offers a general health clinic, as well as women's and sports medicine clinics. Lafene also houses a laboratory, nutrition counseling, physical therapy and radiology departments and a pharmacy.

KEEP GRADES UP

The largest library on campus — Hale — is K-State students' main stop for studying, gaining Internet access, checking out books and using online databases. The library is open for long hours each day, but services like research assistance are offered only during certain hours, so check www.lib.ksu.edu for more information.

Several coin-operated laundry facilities available to students both on, off campus

By Jaimee Keister
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As the laundry pile builds and the smell becomes unbearable, students might need to find options for washing their clothes.

There are several laundry facilities both on and off campus for students to use.

The residence halls have laundry facilities accessible to residents. These facilities are available 24 hours a day, said Brianne Rogers, Housing and Dining Services employee. The cost per use of a washer in the dorms is 50 cents and 25 cents for a dryer, she said.

However, because there is a limited number of machines available, the laundry facilities are not always easily accessible.

Jessica Cain, junior in animal science, said there are always several students waiting to use them.

However, there are plenty of off-campus options for students, each with their own benefits.

Speed Wash Laundry, 1118 Moro St., allows students to shop around or grab dinner while they wait for their laundry. It is open 24 hours a day and offers free wireless Internet for its customers.

Chris Patch, senior in mass communications, said using a washing machine costs $1.50, and nine minutes in the dryer costs 25 cents.

Suds Y'R Duds, 1453 Anderson Ave., is open from 5 a.m. to 1 a.m.

The cost of using a washer ranges from $1.75 to $3 depending on the size of the washer, said Susan Evans, Wamego resident. Use of the dryer costs 25 cents but usually takes 50 cents to get the load dry, she said.

Evans has been traveling from Wamego to Manhattan for 20 years to do her laundry at Suds Y'R Duds. Evans said she likes the convenient location and how clean the facility is.

Dry Clean City, 427 E. Poyntz Ave., has three drop-off locations for laundry and dry cleaning, said Jesse Marden, Dry Clean City employee. Drop-off locations include Varney's Bookstore, K-State Union Bookstore and Shanagans in Wamego.

Marden said laundry dropped off any time between Monday and Thursday can be picked up the next day after 5 p.m., and if laundry is left on Friday or Saturday, it can be picked up after 5 p.m. Monday.

The price range for laundry is between $2 and $7 depending on the item, Marden said. Dry-cleaning costs range from $4 to $13.

John Jobe, senior in family studies and human services, folds clothes at Suds Y'R Duds Laundromat. Jobe lived in an apartment complex, so he said he chose to go to a laundromat.

World-wide friendship

Reaching out to international students can provide learning experience for Americans

My new roommate this year is from Missouri, and it's turned out to be a pretty big adjustment for me to make.

So far I've realized she wears weird clothes and listens to music I've never heard before. But don't worry - I think everything is going to be OK.

In fact, I might actually learn something from her, because I definitely learned a lot from my last roommate.

Last year, one of my roommates was an international student from Japan.

JACQUE HAAG

In all seriousness, I had a few concerns about meeting her. What would she be like? Could I believe stereotypes? Would she wear strange clothes and eat strange food? Would she even speak English?

But at the same time, I was really excited. In high school, I enjoyed spending time with exchange students, because I could learn so much from them. So I tried to keep an open mind about living with someone from another country.

The truth is, I couldn't have known the benefits of living with her.

Obviously, this was a great opportunity for us to share our culture with each other.

She taught me how to eat with chopsticks, and I taught her how to buy off-brand items at Wal-Mart.

With our friendship, we each had a chance to break stereotypes. Turns out, my roommate did not play the violin or seem particularly interested in math. I considered this a chance for me to boost the image people from other countries have of the United States.

There was definitely a lot we experienced together.

She went home with me for Thanksgiving and was subjected to my large, loud, crazy family. (In my defense, I spent an hour and a half trying to mentally prepare her for it on the drive home.)

And I was present for the Japanese dinner parties she had. I ate some good Japanese food and learned big food words. (My favorite is okonomiyaki.)

In December, we set up a Christmas tree and made ornaments for it. When she left to go back to Japan for winter break, she asked our friends to make ornaments for her, and she took a Christmas tree back with her on the plane. She calls this her "family tree," because we are her American family.

Now, it might be a little late to pick a new roommate, but it's just the right time to be picking new friends.

At K-State, students would have to go out of their way not to meet international students. More than likely international students are in your residence halls, dining centers or classes.

Most are excited to be in the United States and really want to be friends with students here. They're not here just to study but to improve their English and learn more about our culture, so don't rob them of the opportunity.

If you're going to the grocery store, offer a ride to the Venezuelan who lives down the hall. If you're eating lunch without your normal crew, ask to sit with the Chinese student from your biology class.

Most of us can't afford to travel to another continent while in college, but international students have brought these culture experiences to us here at K-State.

In the end, you can do nothing but benefit from these friendships.

And to my former roommate: "arigato" for the memories.

ASK THE FIFTH YEAR

How to deal

A veteran student offers advice for incoming freshmen on ways to deal with common first-year, residence-hall problems

The summer is drawing to an end.

Prices at the bars are rising, the once lonely streets are crawling with students, people are moving in, Wal-Mart's parking lot is packed.

Thousands of our friends have graduated and moved out, yet thousands more are on their way in. Freshmen. Clueless, lost, alone and extremely vulnerable. I love it.

I was born and hardened on the streets of Topeka and moved here right out of high school. I'm currently the vice president of the K-State Disc Golf Club, and I am also involved in other clubs like Fruit of the Fight, Student Friends of the Beach Museum of Art, and Wildcats Forever (though I fail to see how this is a club at all). I recently took home my first Intramural Championship T-shirt, so I've got that going for me, too. While I don't have much wisdom, I do have some advice that might be useful to you.

1. Should I live and study in the residence halls or off campus in an apartment complex?

Dorms, dorms, dorms. No question. Meeting new people can be the most difficult thing for freshmen to do. Having new friends makes college a lot easier than the first few semesters. The people you meet your freshman year will likely become your best friends for years to come. The residence halls give you that opportunity. You are crammed in with a bunch of students your age or close to it, forced to live, eat, sleep and dream together. Think about it — it is a huge building full of college students all looking to meet new people. You are bound to find at least one person that can tolerate you. Take advantage of it. Then later on in college, you can live with these folks in apartments and run-down homes with ivy growing in through your walls, the ceiling collapsing, grass that comes up to your knees, and ants the size of your head stalking you in the night. Enjoy.

2. Should I choose a major once I get to college or take a couple classes and see what I like? What is a good major to choose?

Is this a serious question? Economics. No, choose a major whenever you are ready. Do not let parents, money, or your own elevated expectations force you down a path you do not want. I wasted two years in engineering because I was told I would be good at it. I was, but I hated it. I grew much disdain toward Paslay lecture hall.

Honestly I always thought it was a bad idea to go to college right out of high school. All I did was waste money the first two years.

Eventually you will stumble onto something that works for you. Everyone is different. Personally I envy my friends in architecture; I wish I had their dedication, but I do not. I like economics, so I do that. I have a friend who is a paint major. Yeah. Paint. Who would have thought? Another friend is a vet-med student who was paid to play with monkeys all summer. There is a world of options out there — just find what works for you.

3. Would you recommend studying abroad? Where can I find information about studying abroad at K-State?

Yes. Just yes. Really it should be required to study abroad. It will be one of the greatest experiences of your life, and it will certainly give you a more open look on life as well as help give you direction.

There's a Study Abroad Fair from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. Sept. 11 in the K-State Student Union Courtyard. It will be extremely useful in finding out when and where you would like to go. I highly recommend going to it. I can not stress it enough — study abroad.

4. I'm really nervous about college classes. How do I study for big tests, and where can I get help with my classes? Also, how can I balance social life with academics?

Go to class. Go to class. Go to class. I will say it again, go to class. I used to have a 40 percent rule. Make it to 40 percent of my classes that week and I was good. My grade point average that semester: 0.8. I quickly found myself on academic warning, and if it were not for a few good semesters previously I would have been kicked out of school.

Go to all your classes. And if your roommate does not go to class, get away from him or her as soon as possible. It is like the plague; it will get you too.

Do not let an easy A become a B. Trust me — it happens all too often, and you won't care then, but later on, it will get to you.

Do not blow off your studies. I recommend studying for half an hour a night. Nothing too strenuous; you don't want to get burnt out. Just go over your notes each night, and when tests come around start studying at least a week in advance. It is much easier and much less stressful if you study an hour each night for a week than cramming for five hours the night before.

Another thing you'll find quite common is to have several tests in one week. Professors love it. Do not go out that week. Save it for the weekend when it's all over. And if it all becomes overwhelming, there is plenty of help available in many places. Leasure Hall has a wonderful tutoring center, where both group and individual sessions are available. I know most math and engineering classes will also have optional help sessions. These are great if you are having trouble with an assignment.

Do not miss out on life because you are worried about grades. But trust me — study first, then go out. Go out when you can. Spend a whole weekend out at the lake or down at Pillsbury Crossing. If you stay on top of your studies you will find you will have a lot more free time than you might expect.

5. What are the pros and cons of graduating from college in less than four years?

Pro: ...

Con: Dumb idea.

Unless you hate people, enjoy being a hermit and have no desire to communicate with the outside world — then don't. In that case, you are a pod, and you will probably enjoy being alone forever. It ain't me, babe, it ain't me.

6. In your opinion, what are the most common problems freshmen students come across in their first year? What were some of your common problems, and what advice would you give concerning them?

Besides being broke?

Really, my freshman year went pretty well. Roommates can be problematic at times, but there are ways around that. Just go hang out across the hall and play "Mike Tyson's Punch-Out" — that is what I did.

However if your roommate is the type that likes to have sex in your room at all hours of the night, turn the hose on them. Be their friend first, but if they won't respect you, pee on their pillow.

I lived with a racist and two pot heads. We got along great. Actually not at all. I spent a lot of my time across the hall mastering "NHL 2002." But that is how I met some of my best friends and roommates now. So all is well.

I also was traveling back to Topeka a lot to see the old sweetheart. Dumb. Do not keep up a long-distance relationship in college. You will miss out on way too much, and she is probably cheating on you anyway.

The best advice I can give you is to just do it. If you want to go to Europe, do it. If you want to be a doctor, do it. If you like to sew, or you like to draw, or you like to write, just do it.

I know so many people that are afraid to take a risk and try something they would like. It is too easy to get stuck in a rut in life and get caught doing nothing you want to do and everything you hate.

Often times you are the only person standing in the way of your dreams. You just have to let go and believe you will be all right, because you will be.

And feel free to call me. I am always up for anything, especially if there is pie.

Adam Reichenberger is a senior in economics and mathematics. Please send comments to edge@spub.ksu.edu.

Make friends in dorms

Meeting people in a new place is not always easy, but there are plenty of ways students can ease the process. The residence halls are the ideal place to make new friends when you are just starting out in college.

BRIDGETTE A. WEST

OPEN DOORS

One of the easiest ways to meet people is to keep the door open — literally. To allow people to introduce themselves, put laundry detergent or any heavy object in front of the door to keep it ajar. Obviously safety is something to keep in mind, so be sure to close it when no one is in the room.

BULLETIN BOARDS

A great tool for students is the bulletin board in their residence hall and on their floor. Most groups and organizations post flyers on it about events and meetings throughout the semester. Attend any event that sounds interesting, even if there isn't a friend or group to go with. Other people there might have similar interests.

LUNCH DATES

Resident assistants will be the most helpful during the first few weeks of school, and the students on the same floor will be some of the easiest to get to know. Setting up a time for people in the residence hall to meet in the dining hall for lunch or dinner is a great way to socialize with other students.

SITTING WITH NEW PEOPLE

Don't be afraid to sit down with someone new when going to the dining halls, library or class. Keep in mind everyone else is going through the same experience, so don't be afraid to make the first move.

Some good conversation starters are asking about class schedules, hometowns, or interests and activities they might have participated in during high school.

STUDY GROUPS

When getting to know classmates, starting a study group is another way to get to know them and an easy way to invite others to join. While students' classes might not be that interesting, at least there will be people to study with.

HANGOUT SPOTS

Hanging out in the lobby of the residence hall is an easy way to get to know the names and faces of neighbors. That makes a person more approachable. Some great ways to interact with people on the same floor is to play cards or board games in the lobby.

INTRAMURAL SPORTS

Another activity that can unite a floor is competition; intramurals are a great way to get to know each other. Try to organize a floor or residence-hall team for an intramural sport.

CAR POOLING

If you leave campus to go to the grocery store, get some fast food or go shopping, don't hesitate to ask other students on your floor if they want to join you. Also keep in mind most international students don't have cars and getting off campus can be quite difficult.

SUNDAY MEALS

Sundays can be a difficult day in the residence halls because the dining centers are closed. Try having a floor potluck dinner or going out to eat as a group. If you live in a residence hall with a kitchen, try cooking meals with a variety of foods you haven't tried before to experience new things with other students.

Most importantly, students should keep their minds open and not be afraid to introduce themselves.

Bridgette A. West is a senior in mass communications, public relations and political science. Please send comments to opinion@spub.ksu.edu.

MUSIC TO HELP YOU MOVE IN

New music can motivate students to get unpacked

So you're back in Manhattan readying yourself for the start of a new school semester.

MARK SIBILLA

It's now time to fend for yourself. No longer can you rely on your parents for free food and laundry services, and if you're anything like me, you have stacks upon stacks of boxes and plastic tubs ready to be unpacked and organized.

Nothing is quite as daunting a task as having piles upon piles of storage units staring you down with God-knows-what stashed inside them.

Unpacking is what a bummer. But I have the perfect solution to get you motivated and help those hours of sorting through random stuff fly by: music.

GRINDERMAN, "GRINDERMAN"

On the self-titled debut of his newest project, Nick Cave picks up his guitar, grows a moustache and drops his backing band, The Bad Seeds, from seven to three. "Grinderman" finds Cave reverting back to the sound of his first band, boisterous post-punk outfit The Birthday Party.

The album is a testosterone-fueled romp through the twisted mind of Cave as he decies his inability to get into bed with a groupie ("No Pussy Blues"), expresses his masculine malaise and dysfunction ("Love Bomb") and encourages his listeners to let loose ("Get It On"). Cave's lyrics, full of humor and curious turns of phrase, are surrounded by the immense cacophony created by his bandmates. The album is full of freewheeling rock-'n'-roll snarl and begs to be cranked to full volume every time it hits the speakers.

JUSTICE, "D.A.N.C.E."

is the sound of producer Quincy Jones taking his "Off the Wall" — era production style and applying it to the Jackson Five.

For those who are less of a music aficionado than I am and have no clue what I'm talking about, just imagine a funky slap bass, soaring disco strings and a heavy four-on-the-floor beat backing a children's chorus and a lead singer that sounds suspiciously like a young Michael Jackson. This extremely fun and bouncy song is the kind of track that will have you moving your hips and singing along in no time flat.

THE MATHEMATICS, "GREAT BEHINDS STINK ALIKE"

And now for a little bit of local flavor: The Mathematics is a Manhattan-based punk-rock outfit that is the brainchild of frontman Duke Fame and his "sensitive quarter-Jew sidekick" Seven Arizona-Black. The boys originally cut their teeth touring as The Cuckoos throughout the Upper Northwest, but after the band parted ways, Fame and Black returned to Kansas and formed The Mathematics in the summer of 1999.

The band plays unpretentious punk music that is as catchy as it is hip-shaking. On "Great Behinds Stink Alike," the band's third album, The Mathematics created 16 songs that perfectly capture the fun and nihilism of punk music, while sticking to its simplicity. The band will have you singing along with its spirited anthems by the second chorus of each song, guaranteed.

M.I.A., "KALA"

The second album from this Sri Lankan-British rapper isn't released nationally until Tuesday, but I already have listened to the entire album. (Thank you, Internet.) I easily can say it is better than her amazing 2005 debut, "Arular."

By including edgy beats that incorporate everything from multiple Indian music styles, Jamaican dance hall, Australian aboriginal hip-hop and samples of the Clash, M.I.A. has proven her debut wasn't just a flash in the pan. "Kala" helps prove there are still plenty of fresh ideas and new moves to examine in the aging genre — you just have to dig a little to find them.

PARTS & LABOR, "FRACTURED SKIES"

Noise is a difficult genre of music to explore and enjoy due to its adamant disregard of usual musical (especially pop music) structures. It often takes a sharp ear and a lot of patience to discern any real musicality. Sometimes, along comes a band that makes the genre accessible.

Enter Parts & Labor. From the album "Mapmaker," "Fractured Skies" has a very energetic drum line over which electronics, feedback and keyboards are used to create the main hooks of the song rather than the typical guitar and bass. The song is built on frenetic energy created by the band and soaring choruses that are just begging to be sung along to. When the horns enter the fray, the song jumps to a whole new level of awesomeness. If you enjoy "Fractured Skies," check out the rest of the album for more rollicking songs that are a little unconventional but very catchy.

Residence hall officials introduce program to provide students with more security

By Monica Castro
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Over the past year, Housing and Dining Services has reviewed new ways to increase housing security in the residence halls.

Before a program would be put into action however, Housing and Dining went to the Association of Residence Halls earlier this year to see how a new program would work and also to get students' opinions about the idea.

In response to the safety concerns, the new program that K-State's residence halls will implement this fall is called Door Assistance.

"Instead of a CA, community assistant, who sits at the front desk, there will also be a door assistant," said Erica Jennings, community assistant for Moore Hall. "They will check the doors between 9 p.m. to 3 a.m. every night of the week."

Jennings, sophomore in family studies and human services, said she believes having someone focused on just the doors will be more effective for safety than having only community assistants at the front desk.

The door assistant will be standing outside the door and have a card reader. The card reader will transmit all of an individual's information to the computers at the front desk to ensure they are valid students.

If a student should forget their ID, they will have to give their information to the front desk.

"If residents are bringing in a guest they must say who they are and sign in and out every time they leave the residence hall," Jennings said.

Students who have guests are not required to turn in their IDs as other universities have them do.

"I think that having guests register at the front doors is good," said Tim Wilkins, sophomore in secondary education. "You don't want to have random people going in and out."

Wilkins said he thinks it will be effective and is a positive change for K-State. He also said the program is not a big change and will not take much getting used to.

"I think students will have to learn this new system and to carry their IDs with them all the time," said Derek Jackson, assistant director of housing and dining.

In previous years, the residence halls would lock the doors and require the residents to swipe their IDs after 11 p.m., but now the doors will be locked at 9 p.m. The wing doors of all residence halls will be denied access at 9 p.m. as part of the program as well.

"Guests are your responsibility," Jackson said. "You will have accountability for them."

Jackson also said he hopes this program will make its residents feel safer with the security measures being added.

"The Department of Housing and Dining is looking for people that are helpful and will be able to verify students' identities. We are not looking for bouncers," he said. "We want students to feel safe in rooms and halls, and we feel that Door Assistance will complement that safety."

In Marlatt Hall, there will be about four or five staff members, hall director David Yoder said. He also said the number of staff will vary from residence hall.

"Since this is a new program we will be evaluating it and seeing how it works," Yoder said. "And there will be possible adjustments as this program is running."

Andria Nelson, sopho-

Brandon Wiley, sophomore in pre-professional construction science and management, swipes his student ID card through the Moore Hall scanner April 17.

HOW TO BUILD A LOFT

These seven steps will help you build a loft that meets Housing and Dining Standards.

WHAT YOU WILL NEED:

Drill with a 3/8-inch drill bit eight carriage bolts
16 hex nuts
16 3/8-inch washers
1 lb. 1/2-inch tan deck screws four 12-foot two-by-fours one 16-foot two-by-four one 8-foot two-by-four two 12-foot two-by-sixes one 16-foot two-by-sixes

STEPS:

1. Measure the wood for the frame. The outside pieces should be two 88-inch two-by-sixes and two 37-inch two-by-sixes. The inside of the frame that will hold the bed should be two 85-inch two-by-fours and two 34-inch two-by-fours.

2. Drill two 3/8-inch holes at each end of the wood pieces.

3. Secure one bolt on each end of the outside pieces of the frame using the carriage bolts, which will later secure the legs to the frame.

4. Make the legs by using both of the 12-foot two-by-sixes, and you should cut those into four 68-inch pieces. Then you will take two of the four 12-foot two-by-fours to make four 68-inch pieces.

5. Drill two 3/8-inch holes at one end of each 68-inch board and put one two-by-six and one two-by-four to lift the frame.

6. Take one of the 12-foot two-by-fours and cut it into a 102-inch piece that will be bolted diagonally by two bolts.

7. Cut one of the remaining 12-foot two-by-fours into three 34-inch pieces that will be used as the steps. Drill two 3/8-inch holes at each end and bolt the steps to the legs.

Feng shui is a Chinese practice to enhance the balance of yin and yang in a space. One technique is to place a bed so the foot of the bed does not directly face the door.

Feng shui style can reduce stress

One way to achieve a healthy, stress-free environment throughout the semester is to use the ancient art of feng shui.

Feng shui is defined as the Chinese art or practice of creating harmonious surroundings that enhance the balance of yin and yang, as in arranging furniture or determining the sitting of the house, according to www.dictionary.com.

Though some K-State students are interested in using feng shui, others are not.

"I'm not really into that sort of thing," said Charlie Clarkson, freshman in open option. "I don't really understand what the real feng shui thing is all about or what it really does to help your room."

"It is something that guys probably don't understand and don't really care much about."

The placement of the bed in a room is key to feng shui design because restful sleep is important. A negative to this is that there are certain limitations in rearranging furniture in a residence-hall room.

Try to avoid placing the bed too close to the window. According to the art of feng shui, the chi, or flow of energy, will disperse through the window. Also, do not place a bed in a way so the foot of the bed directly faces the door. In doing so, the resident will be in what the Chinese call the death position.

Having a roommate also can prevent students from using certain feng shui techniques because of limited space. However, by placing two beds on each side of the room as far away from a window as possible and the foot of the bed toward the window, one should get a good night's rest with much chi.

While using feng shui techniques, choosing the right colors to have in a room is vital. Certain colors are associated with yin and others with yang. Yin tends to bring about resting and relaxing. Yang colors help motivation and enthusiasm.

The yin color of blue encourages a calm environment, so choosing this color for sheets or decorations would be a positive help.

Black symbolizes money and is associated with power.

Purple is associated with mental and physical awareness.

White symbolizes poise, purity and confidence.

Orange, a yang color, represents many things like organization and creativity. It is helpful to use this color in your room to strengthen concentration.

Yellow represents movement and warmth, and yang colors like red, tan and brown represent certain feelings like love and luck.

"I would use bright colors because they are happy," said Megan Bowersox, freshman in elementary education.

Though painting the walls in the residence halls at K-State is not permitted, there are other ways to add feng shui color to your room.

Hanging posters without nails and placing pictures on your desk are great ways to use yin and yang. It is essential to remember to balance out the yin and yang colors, because if too much of one is used, there might be too much energy and stress.

Other feng shui tips include being organized, using plants and having round side tables. Avoid blocking chi by placing too many things in front of windows and on top of furniture.

Feng shui can be helpful in relieving stress if the techniques are used correctly.

Jardine residents will start the semester with food and neighborhood competitions. The winning neighborhood will be awarded a trophy.

K-State Volleyball scrimmage

5:30 p.m.
Ahearn Field House
Admission: Free

After a rough 2006 campaign, which saw the Wildcats lose 10-straight matches at one point, K-State will kick off its season with the annual Purple and White scrimmage.

Sunday

Movies on the grass

7-10:30 p.m.
Coffman Commons
Admission: Free

Movies on the Grass will be back for a third year.

On Sunday, "Who Killed the Electric Car?" will begin the four-movie series at 8 p.m.

An electric car show will precede the movie at 7 p.m.

"Favela Rising," "Maxed Out," and "Yesterday" will be the other three movies playing throughout the month.

All the movies are free and open to the public.

Dining halls offer students healthy breakfasts, nutrition information

By Austin Apple
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For students who are unsure how to start eating healthier, the K-State dining halls offer ways to help.

Each dining hall has registered dietitians on staff to help students plan their meals.

They also can help students discuss a variety of health needs — everything from how to read nutrition facts to choosing which foods to eat.

"The dietitians make sure that the right serving size is given to students," said Melanie Errebo, sophomore in elementary education and student employee at Derby Dining Center.

Nutrition facts are displayed next to each food item so students can see what they are consuming, she said.

"There is one line where you get your main course, and there is also a salad bar," Errebo said.

"There are a ton of different choices."

Michelle Netson, registered dietitian for Derby, said she encourages students to go for complex carbohydrates like fruits instead of simple sugars.

Complex carbohydrates are better because they supply the body with a steady energy source, said Cassandra Nelson, senior in kinesiology.

"The difference between complex and simple carbohydrates is the complex won't spike your blood sugar," Nelson said.

Netson said she encourages students to space meals throughout the day, which allows the body to perform at its optimum level.

"This allows the body to get the nutrients and energy from foods for the body to utilize,"

she said.

According to the Breakfast Research Institute, 33 percent of young adults from 20 to 29 skip breakfast or consume only a beverage one out of every three mornings.

"Breakfast should be one of the main meals of the day," said Norma Slagle, registered licensed dietitian for Mercy Regional Diabetes Center.

It is beneficial to consume 200 calories before 10 a.m. because it allows people to concentrate better, she said.

The dining centers have many options for students.

There is a hot breakfast consisting of French toast, eggs, pancakes and waffles.

The cold breakfast has yogurt, cereal and toaster waffles.

There are also muffins and homemade bread.

Dashers is an option students can choose if they are in a hurry or would just like to eat in their rooms.

"If students have any questions, there are registered dietitians in each of the dining centers, and (students) are more than welcome to call us and we will talk with them," Netson said.

Free, on-campus tutoring services available to all students

By Hannah Blick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When Chelcie Heitman decided to take the advice of her adviser and get a tutor for her college algebra class, she had no idea the kind of effect the decision would have on her college career.

That was nearly two years ago, and now Heitman, junior in secondary education and social studies, works as a tutor herself.

"When I went in to sign up for a tutor, I felt really comfortable," Heitman said. "The office staff is very friendly, and they are flexible with your schedule."

Heitman said she clicked right away with her tutor, who then talked her into applying for an English tutoring position. She works an average of 12-15 hours a week and earns $6.50 an hour.

"Tutoring is a great way to meet all kinds of different people from all around campus," she said. "You are not only teaching them, but they help you to broaden your perspective and learn to work in a one-on-one environment."

Kim Dierks, coordinator of the Leasure Hall Tutoring Center, said any K-State student can apply for a free tutor, and tutors are available for most subjects.

Students can fill out applications in Holton 101, from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. during the work week.

"All our on-campus tutoring services are free of charge," Dierks said. "The funding is provided through the Education Opportunity Fund included in students' campus privilege fees."

There are also walk-in English and math tutors available every hour, limited to five students at a time, Dierks said. Sessions begin on the hour and last 50 minutes each.

Rachael Heck, junior in secondary education and family and consumer sciences, is another student who sought help from the tutoring center. Heck first attended tutoring sessions held in the Derby Complex, and said she would recommend looking into residence hall study groups first for anyone who is apprehensive about applying for a tutor.

"My tutor was always prepared when I went to my sessions and always made me feel free to ask any questions," Heck said. "We exchanged numbers and met when it was convenient if I couldn't get off work for my regular sessions."

The biggest problem tutors see is students realizing they need help too late, Heitman said.

Heitman, who tutors mostly English and political science subjects, urges students to seek a tutor as soon as they start becoming confused in class or falling behind.

Student Life office seeks to help students get involved on campus

By Jaimee Keister
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In the fast-paced world of college, some students become lost in the shuffle, but there is a place on campus where they can find ways to get involved.

The Office of Student Life — a place where people can come to ask questions and receive help — provides all K-State students with campus life services.

Carla Jones, assistant vice president of Student Life, said the office makes referrals for campus services and helps students find activities to become involved with on campus.

For example, the office helps homesick students get involved with different organizations on campus, Jones said.

There are a variety of student life offices, including Adult Student Services, Student Activities and Services, Religious Affairs and the Women's Center.

In addition to helping students get involved, the office acts as a liaison between students and their departments.

If students are sick or injured, Student Life can contact the dean's office of each college along with the students' professors, though Jones said each college has a different policy regarding when professors are notified.

In some cases, the Office of Student Life will contact professors even if the college's policy does not allow for excused absences, she added.

Jones said the office's goal is to help students in any way possible, and students are often surprised by the wide range of services offered.

"A service the Office of Student Life provides that I did not know about was legal advice and assistance," said Kim Woodyard, senior in family studies and human services. "I contacted the Office of Student Life, and I am currently using their assistance."

Jones said the office works hard to get the word out and promote itself, making presentations in orientation classes and at greek houses. However, she said students often find out about the office by word of mouth.

"One thing every K-State student should know about the Office of Student Life is that it is responsible for the philosophy of putting students first on the K-State campus," said Pat Bosco, dean of student life.

School year starts amid tornado's aftermath

ASSOCIATED PRESS

GREENSBURG, Kan. — There's no Internet, no cafeteria, not even a locker-lined hallway in sight.

But school is back in session in Greensburg, just as Superintendent Darin Headrick vowed it would be.

Days after a deadly tornado killed 10 people and wiped out the south-central Kansas town on May 4, Headrick promised that Unified School District 422's students would attend classes this fall in Greensburg, no matter what.

The school year started Wednesday, with just under three-fourths of the student body returning from the 2006-07 year.

"This is an important day for our community," said Amber Campbell, the grade school's vocal music teacher. "If the school makes it, I think our community makes it."

There are shortcomings, to be sure, at the makeshift school complex just outside the city limits, on land where the elementary and junior high schools once stood.

There are no permanent buildings, only 28 trailers, and the parking lot remains to be poured.

Phone lines remain to be installed, and many classrooms are without computers, boards — even chairs.

Lunches are prepared at a nearby senior citizens' center and eaten in classrooms, while contractors work to complete a temporary cafeteria and auditorium.

"But we have kids, teachers and textbooks," Headrick said. "We have everything we need to have school."

Students don't mind the setup, sophomore Connor Staats said.

"Walking outside in between classes, that's my vision of what college is like," Connor, 15, said earlier this week. "For once, I've been looking forward to school."

Students are also grateful for all the help their down and district have gotten from outside donors, Connor said.

"Every once and a while, you stop and go, 'Wow, people are really nice,'" he said. "It's like, 'Thank you, people I don't know!'"

Teachers are also glad to get back to a familiar routine, said Connor's mother, Susan Staats, who teaches junior high English.

"This summer's been about talking with SBA (the Small Business Administration), wondering, 'Do you have your loan? Have you called the cable company?'" she said. "It's almost like a Calgon moment: Take me away, let me go to school and teach something I'm familiar with."

Keeping Greensburg's students at home, rather than merging USD 422 into another district, was important to efforts to resurrect the town, Headrick said.

"We knew if we were going to get people to move back into town, we had to have a

7 Manhattan spots every K-State student should visit

"MANHATTAN" AND "KS" HILLS

Manhattan Hill: at the intersection of Juliette and Bluemont Scenic Drive
KS Hill: Off Kansas Highway 177 and Crestline Drive

These hills overlook Manhattan and the Flint Hills, providing spectacular views. The hills face each other, thus providing different views of Manhattan. Both places are great to hang out, have picnics and simply enjoy being outside with beautiful scenery.

Between Fremont Street and Poyntz Avenue on North 14th and 11th

With its pavilions and plenty of open spaces, City Park is a great place to meet for any kind of large function or get-together. A group can eat in the pavilion and play a game of flag football in the fields.

TUTTLE CREEK STATE PARK (ABOVE)

Off Tuttle Creek Boulevard, north of the K-State campus, (785) 539-7941

Offering a beach area, camping grounds, fishing and hunting, Tuttle Creek is a great place to spend a few days camping or just a day laying out at the beach.

"I enjoy (Tuttle Creek) because you can go out there and go fishing and boating," said Tony Kinkade, senior in animal sciences and industry. "One time we grilled on the grills out there and played Frisbee golf. It is just a fun place to hang out with friends."

MANHATTAN TOWN CENTER

At Poyntz Avenue and Fort Riley Boulevard

Town Center is a single-level shopping center located in downtown Manhattan. Built in 1987, the center features department stores such as Dillard's, JCPenney and Sears, as well as more than 70 small shops. Restaurants are also on site, including Carlos O'Kelly's, Old Chicago, Applebee's and Chili's.

SUNSET ZOOLOGICAL PARK

On Oak Street behind Manhattan High School

Sunset Zoo features a wide variety of animals. The zoo has about 340 individual animals, which represent 105 different species. It is open 360 days a year in any weather. This can be a fun place for students to spend part of the afternoon, as it takes about an hour to get through the entire zoo.

PILLSBURY CROSSING WILDLIFE AREA

Off Kansas Highway 177

Pillsbury Crossing is a popular area for K-State students. The location includes a waterfall, and students go to swim, tan, hang out and simply have fun.

"I like Pillsbury a lot, because you can pull up your truck in the water and listen to music," said Christina Pacheco, junior in interior design and gerontology. "It is also fun to play Frisbee and hang out in the water on a hot day."

TAD'S TROPICAL SNO (BOTTOM RIGHT)

In the Hastings parking lot on Tuttle Creek Boulevard

Despite its small size, this snow-cone establishment features a wide variety of snow-cone flavors from the traditional single flavors, like grape, to creations like piña colada.

"They have a lot of fun flavors," Lani Thomas, sophomore in pre-nursing, said. "I like to go out there and grab a snow cone with my friends."

ATHLETIC EVENTS

Anyone carrying K-State ID can enter student section at games

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The student section at K-State football games is usually not just full of purple-clad K-State students.

Parents, students from rival universities and even younger siblings are also in the stands.

Robin Fosha, director of ticket operations, said everyone who enters the student section needs a ticket and a valid K-State identification card to get into games. The tickets are scanned whenever fans enter or exit the stadium.

Fosha said ticket takers usually do not check if the IDs actually belong to the student, making it easier to bring non-students into the student section.

She said the ticket office has considered electronically putting tickets on the ID cards, but added that the measure would be a disadvantage to students.

"We would like to put the tickets on the IDs - it would be easier," Fosha said. "But it wouldn't be fair to the students because you couldn't swap tickets or bring your dad to games anymore."

Shawna Castillo, junior in animal sciences and industry, said she has friends visit often and usually has no problem getting them into the game.

Castillo said she is pleased at how the ticket system works because she can easily bring friends from her home state of Iowa for Iowa State games.

"I think the system's pretty good," Castillo said. "They don't even look at the picture on the ID."

However, not just any ID will work, Castillo said, adding that the ticket officials would not let her in with an older ID card last season.

Not every student who buys tickets will attend every game, so many of them sell tickets to students who need them.

Last year, Ben Zimmerman, sophomore in open option, purchased season tickets but could not make it to several games.

"If there was a game I couldn't make it to, I would just sell it to make money," he said.

This season he did not buy tickets and will have to rely on students like him to buy tickets from, which has not been a problem in the past.

Castillo said she occasionally has problems finding inexpensive tickets and IDs because so many students want to go, especially to popular games like Kansas and Missouri.

Last year, student tickets were scanned for the first time to ensure proper seating. Fosha said this precaution will be taken at every ticket gate this fall.

"The students last year were guinea pigs, and this year we're extending it to everyone," Fosha said.

Though the ticket office can monitor who gets into the games, it is much more difficult to monitor what happens inside the stadium. Fosha said the ticket managers have issues with students sneaking into different sections.

"It's pretty tough to police that when we get in there because it's so crowded," she said.

There are ushers at the top of the stairs in the stadium, but the ticket office mainly relies on students policing themselves, she said.

As of Thursday, Fosha said about 1,200 general admission and 250 reserve tickets remain.

They will be sold beginning Aug. 28. Fosha said reserve tickets usually do not sell out and the remaining seats will be open to the public.

Stay active, avoid 'freshman 15'

Gaining 15 pounds is rarely a goal for incoming college freshmen, even though the poundage is equally anticipated and loathed.

Once separated from the childhood pantry, hard bodies might soften under the comfort foods of a generation, victimized by the notorious "freshman 15."

Vending-machine snacks, fast food, frozen meals and alcohol are full of empty calories that fuel the body for short periods of time but offer little valuable nutrition. Over time, the convenience of cheap, readily available food can replace a body's hunger for vitamins with cravings for super-size amounts of the smallest slice of the pyramid.

However, students can avoid the unwanted weight by making a few minor dietary changes.

Improving a poor diet doesn't require a special trip to the health-food store since many empty calories now come in two flavors: bad and better.

If you make a conscious effort to pig out on reduced-fat, diet, or no-sugar-added snacks and drinks instead of the original recipes, you can trick your body into craving Baked Lays instead of Ruffles. A year of decisions like that might not burn calories, but at least there will be fewer to worry about.

For example, the nutrition facts on a box of blueberry Pop Tarts indicates each tart is 212 calories, but that's only half the story. While Pop Tarts are sold and consumed in pairs, there are technically two servings in each package, bringing the total of the 70-cent snack to 424 empty calories. On the same shelf, however, are low-fat Pop Tarts with only 260 calories a package.

Considering the lack of delicious fruits and vegetables, which cost more and are less available than processed food, it's not surprising that college students would rather drink orange soda than suffer through an out-of-season orange.

Do yourself a favor and remind your body that food from the ground tastes better than ingredients pressed together on an assembly line by going to a farmers' market for your produce instead of Wal-Mart. A peach grown a mile away from your refrigerator is much more edible than the syrupey scoops of fruit cocktail available in the cafeteria, not to mention healthier.

If your only exercise is the daily rush through campus, show up at one of the free classes at Peters Recreation Complex whenever you have time to sweat out your frustrations and abort the beer belly you've been coddling all semester.

The fast-paced, problem-area pounding "Buttz and Gutz" workout is free and perfect for freshmen who want to keep the frame they had back in August but don't have the time for a daily routine.

Joining an intramural sport is a great way to motivate even the most sedentary of freshmen, since it comes with a whole team's worth of motivation to get off the couch. Strength in numbers doesn't apply only to calories.

Being realistic is the first step for anyone wanting to avoid gaining weight during the first year at college. Making minor changes to the way you eat and move is a fast, easy way to ensure you look just as hot — or even better — when you graduate.

Con artists prey on KU students in dorms

By Mark Dent UNIVERSITY DAILY KANSAN

LAWRENCE — University of Kansas student Becky Getman just thought the two men standing in her doorway were students wanting to introduce themselves.

"We had just had a get to know everyone activity," said Getman, a St. Louis sophomore. "I thought they were from my floor."

They were not.

The two men reportedly went to Templin and Lewis Residence Halls Tuesday afternoon and evening attempting to sell magazine subscriptions to students. But according to a release from the KU Public Safety Office, the company the two men claimed to represent did not exist.

Getman and her roommates turned the men away. Other students did not.

About 6:30 p.m. Tuesday, two white males described as about 25 years old reportedly arrived at Elise Longtry and Aryn Kamerer's room on the fifth floor of Lewis Hall. Longtry and Kamerer bought a $40 subscription, each paying $20. They said the men gave them a receipt with the name Element Sales on it, a St. Joseph, Mo., address and a phone number.

Soon after they bought the subscription, Longtry and Kamerer heard someone else tried to contact the phone number on the receipt, and it was a private number. Longtry and Kamerer went to the residence hall's lobby and found the men who sold the magazines. They demanded a refund. The men obliged.

Longtry and Kamerer then called police and filed a non-criminal offense report. When an officer arrived, he called the number on the receipt and the man who answered said the number was for his mother's cell phone, according to the report. The officer said the woman knew nothing about Element Sales. St. Joseph police said the address on the receipt wasn't a "good" address, according to the report.

Two students in Templin Hall also filed reports with the KU Office of Public Safety. Getman did not file a report but said the men tried to sell her magazines. She described an experience similar to the one Longtry and Kamerer filed in their report. Getman also said the men told her that they were selling magazines to earn a trip to Europe. She said men tried to sell her magazines last year using the same story. Getman thought those men were involved in the same plan as the ones from Tuesday.

"They were the smooth-talking salesman type," Getman said. "If you're not used to it, it could be tough to turn them down."

Signs in Templin and Lewis are stationed at the front desks warning students to report anything about people selling magazines. The Department of Student Housing prohibits soliciting in the residence halls.

Inspirational books, reference materials top columnist's list of must-haves for every college student

College is a time of learning, and books are one of the tools that foster the experience.

While the College Board estimates students attending four-year universities spend about $800 a year on textbooks, five books exist outside the textbook realm that every college student should own. Several of the books are great reference tools for essays and papers, while two are inspirational in their simplistic storytelling.

"OH, THE PLACES YOU'LL GO!" BY DR. SEUSS

A creative innovator in his illustrations and rhymes, Dr. Seuss saved his best for last with his final book, "Oh, the Places You'll Go!" The book increases in sales each year during graduation; its simplistic words of encouragement and bright pictures give hope to those embarking on a new experience like college. The book contains inspirational lines like "And when things start to happen, don't worry/Don't stew/Just go right along/You'll start happening too," which offer comfort for those who face uncertainty and confusion. After a long day of classes and work, students can resort back to their childhood and read this picture book for complacency.

"MLA HANDBOOK FOR WRITERS OF RESEARCH PAPERS" BY JOSEPH GIBALDI

Newsweek magazine once called the "MLA Handbook for Writers" the style book for most college students. Expository Writing 101 is stressful, even for English majors, but the Modern Language Association Handbook is designed to make the process easier. Gibaldi discusses a variety of research paper topics in the book, including an up-to-date guide on documentation style and online research techniques.

"TUESDAYS WITH MORRIE: AN OLD MAN, A YOUNG MAN, AND LIFE'S GREATEST LESSON" BY MITCH ALBOM

"Tuesdays with Morrie" is Albom's poignant story about his favorite sociology professor, Morrie

Schwartz, and his reunion with him after losing contact for more than a decade and a half after promises of keeping in touch.

After seeing Schwartz on "Nightline" in 1995, Albom contacts him. Schwartz - who is dying of amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, also known as Lou Gehrig's Disease - meets with Albom every Tuesday and presents him with lessons on the meaning of life. Throughout their conversations, Albom, a sports journalist, reflects on his times as Schwartz's student at Brandeis University. Both men refer to the book as their "last thesis together."

"Tuesdays with Morrie" is the story of how one professor helped change a man's life forever. The book inspires students to keep contact with those mentors who taught them more than basic textbook material.

"THE WORLD ALMANAC AND BOOK OF FACTS 2008" BY WORLD ALMANAC BOOKS AND KEN PARK

Forget Wikipedia - "The World Almanac" is the bestselling U.S. reference book of all time with a history of more than 130 years. The book features information on a variety of topics like world, sports and historical events. Students of all academic majors can consult the almanac for information on a variety of trivial topics.

"MERRIAM-WEBSTER'S COLLEGIATE DICTIONARY"

While it is available within several keystrokes, www.dictionary.com is not a one-stop reference when word searching. Introduced in 1898, Merriam-Webster's Collegiate Dictionary's 11th edition features more than 225,000 definitions. Looking a word up the old-fashioned way forces students into more than just typing some letters into a search engine.

Every academic bookshelf needs a hardback dictionary, and the classic red-covered Merriam-Webster Collegiate Dictionary is the perfect fit.

FALL FASHION

Photos by Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN

Cost-effective blend of classic, trendy clothing in style this season

It's that time of year again. Time to say goodbye to the beaches, pools, flip-flops and bikinis — some of us more readily than others.

But as we mourn the end of summer sun and reluctantly return to two-hour lectures, there are a few things we can look forward to, like back-to-school fashion.

Read on for six cool fall looks for K-State men and women, so you can at least sit through algebra in style.

WOMEN | THE FLAT

A key element to every college woman's closet, a pair of flats creates a versatile look. Not only can you find these shoes in every style (from bows to buckles), in every color (from charcoal to fuchsia) and in every shoe store, but they look amazing with nearly every outfit.

Match them with skinny jeans for a casual look on campus or slip them on with your good-buy sundress for a fun night out in Aggieville.

THE SUMMER SUNDRESS

Sundresses were a must-have from the summer season, but they still can be a great look for fall. By wearing a long- or short-sleeved knit T-shirt under your post-season dress, you can ease your way into the cooler months. You also might want to add leggings or a cardigan for a flawless transition.

Didn't jump on the trend? You're in luck. Sundresses are on sale now in most stores. It's a look that's easy to put together and easy on your wallet.

THE CLASSIC CARDIGAN

This sweater has been reshaped for decades, and it's no wonder the cardigan has never died within the fashion world. Use its versatility to dress up a fitted T-shirt and jeans or dress down your little black dress. The best part about cardigans this year is that they are not the long-sleeved, button-down, cookie-cutter sweater most people know.

This season, cardigans are available in all lengths, shapes, cuts, prints and sizes. These sweaters are perfect for the coming seasons.

THE SKINNY JEAN

Stretch, super low-rise skinny or straight-leg jeans have been prominent in the fashion world for a while, and they are still hot here in the Midwest. Though some women might be hesitant to try on a pair for figure reasons, simply adding a little bulk around the lower leg can make all the difference.

By rolling up the jean and showing a little shin, you can create a cool capri. Also, by tucking your jean into a pair of calf- or knee-high boots, the leg line is cut in half and draws attention upward. This is a look that never fails and is perfect for the coming weather. Lastly, pair a longer skinny jean with some sky-high stilettos for a slimming and elongating effect.

THE HOBO BAG

A hobo bag is a style of handbag or purse that gets its name from its signature crescent shape, resembling a bundle on a stick. Hobo bags are usually large and made of soft, flexible material which tends to slouch when set down.

These bags are ideal for college women for their stylish yet practical use. The size of the bag allows for all kinds of carrying space for notebooks, water bottles and even umbrellas — there's nothing worse than being caught in the rain mid-20-minute walk home.

MEN | THE GRAPHIC TEE

If you've ever walked around campus, I guarantee you have seen more than a few guys wearing a "K-State Girls Rock" or "Jesus Is My Homeboy" T-shirt. Graphic tees have been and will continue to be one of the most popular wardrobe items for men and boys of all ages. And why shouldn't they be? Wearing a screen-printed T-shirt with a saying, image or design is a great way to let people know you have a sense of humor or to become a walking billboard for a cause.

Graphic tees are available at almost any men's clothing store. From Wal-Mart to Armani, people will know you have a great sense of style. You also might want to stop at Threads in Aggieville to create a graphic tee with any design or phrase you can dream up.

THE SCARF

Even before the snow hits, stay looking cool in a loosely wound scarf. Throw one on when trekking to class in the coming months, or mismatch a brown scarf and black shirt for a tousled, yet sophisticated look when meeting your friends at a local coffee shop. Worn with or without a coat, this hot item is sure to attract some attention.

THE LAYERED POLO

One way to stay warm this fall and still be an eye-catcher is by donning a layered polo. No longer are polos reserved for country-club events and business meetings. Wear a long-sleeved thermal under your relaxed or popped collar for a comfortable, casual, cool look that no good college man should be without.

THE FEDORA

Thanks to Justin Timberlake, the fedora hat has been popping up on all over the fashion scene. Not only has he brought sexy back, but JT has brought the mobster high-roller cap back into play. Whether you decide to wear it straight or tilted over your right eye, nothing says p-i-m-p style like a fabulously adorned fedora.

THE CARDIGAN SWEATER

Stop thinking Ward Cleaver and start thinking Brad Pitt and George Clooney. Sure, these cashmere, cable knit and cotton sweaters were once reserved for the ultra-conservative working man back in the day, but they are now a must-have for every style-conscious man.

The V-Neck sweater creates a savvy vintage, indie-kid look, which is perfect for going to class or checking out the Friday night show at P.J.'s Bar.

THE MESSENGER BAG

Messenger bags, often unnecessarily referred to as "man purses," are anything but feminine. These bags are just as masculine as ripping out a handful of chest hair — Super Bowl commercial, anyone? — and entirely more practical.

Slung across your shoulder, messenger bags are perfect for holding notebooks, textbooks, wallets, keys, and just about anything that won't fit into your pockets. But that's what cargo pants are for, you say? Wrong. Cargo pants are a thing of the past. The future is in messenger bags.

Bookstore on campus now offers shuttle service, online textbook list

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The university's official bookstore is offering two new services for students this fall.

Varney's Bookstore will provide a free shuttle service through Tuesday for students to pick up textbooks and school supplies. The service is available because of parking garage construction at the K-State Student Union, said Lindsay Larson, marketing coordinator for Varney's and the Union Bookstore.

Also, a textbook list is now available for students to access at www.kssubookstore.com and www.varneys.com.

SHUTTLE SERVICE

While it is unknown how many students will access the shuttle service, Larson said about 2,000 students pre-ordered their textbooks through Varney's.

"We want to make it as convenient as possible for students to get in and get their supplies," Larson said. "Many students don't know about the parking situation, so we want to make it as smooth as possible."

ONLINE TEXTBOOK LISTING

After an effort from Student Governing Association to get an online textbook listing, Varney's now has textbook titles, authors, International Standard Book Numbers and book editions available through its Web site.

Jeff Levin, Varney's co-owner, said the list started with summer school courses and thousands of students already have accessed the site.

"It's been very successful in providing information," he said.

The listing allows students to preview their textbook information online through academic departments, section numbers and specific instructors from their course schedules, Levin said. It also informs students if the book is optional or required for a particular course.

Levin said the new textbook listing's cost is minimal since the bookstore already has its distance-learning book lists online. Varney's spends about $200,000 a year in developing its book lists. Cost factors include employee salaries, computer software and follow-up with K-State faculty, Levin said.

Student Senate members passed a resolution in support of the online textbook listing at their March 8 meeting with a vote of 41-4-3. University administrators, Varney's officials and SGA leaders met and revised the initial listing proposal several times during the spring semester.

Levin said Varney's has an advantage against other textbook Web sites because the bookstore employs full-time staff members who work year-round with K-State faculty members to get the correct book editions. Due to changing information regarding textbooks, Varney's officials update the online book list about five times a day, Levin said.

"It's one of those fluid things that never ends," he said. "We're already getting ready for fall intersession and distance-learning classes."

Steve Levin, Union Bookstore manager, told the Collegian in April that some students buy and sell their textbooks online, and Varney's also sells its used books online. Jeff Levin said he encourages students to use a PayPal account and to make sure they have found the proper book edition if they buy textbooks from discount Web sites.

"There are definitely bargains out there, but there aren't enough to supply the needs for all students," Levin said. "We're here to meet the needs of all students."

PARKING GARAGE

In for the long haul

Faculty, staff, students asked to be patient during construction

By Mike J. Kelly
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Everyone in K-State's community should make temporary sacrifices in the interest of the university's future, a university official said.

Gary Leitnaker, assistant vice president of human resources and parking, said that despite some antagonistic feelings from community members, the parking garage south of the K-State Student Union will be a large step forward in the quest for parking stability at K-State.

"Let's get excited for it — you know, what the heck," Leitnaker said. "We're building it; let's look forward to it. We're all going to do the best job we can. All of us are going to be inconvenienced."

Parking garage construction began during the first week of August and is expected to last until December 2008. Costing about $15.9 million, the new garage will have 1,384 parking stalls. Murray and Sons, a Topeka-based construction company, won the contract through a bid process that ended in late July.

"They were the low bid," Leitnaker said. "(Murray and Sons) have been great — they really have."

During the proposed 18 months of construction, the 400 parking stalls south of the Union will not be accessible. To assist students and faculty in traveling to the core of campus, parking services and the Union organized a series of shuttle systems. The first shuttle provides non-stop service from the East Bramlage parking lot to the northwest corner of the Union. From 7 a.m. to 6 p.m., three to four 15-passenger vans will leave in 10-minute intervals. However, not all students will be allowed to leave their cars at Bramlage.

"You need to have a parking permit to park, and you always have in that lot north of the (Peters Recreation Complex)," Leitnaker said.

Originally, parking services had planned to lease school buses from USD 383, but an agreement could not be reached.

"They told us the day after we got the bid that they were unable to fill that request, that they were having a tough time hiring bus drivers," Leitnaker said.

A second shuttle will provide service from the Memorial Stadium lot, located between Denison Avenue and Sunset Avenue, to the Union in the evening from 5:15-9 p.m. to alleviate the parking burden during the Union's night activities.

For those students who miss the 6 p.m. deadline of the Bramlage shuttle, a courtesy ride will be available at the Cats' Den in the Union. Jack Connaughton, associate director of the Union, said that he and his staff developed ideas during the summer to make the transition easier for everyone.

"We've talked about that all summer," Connaughton said. "Again, you have to keep in mind that we don't have any track record on how this is going to work. So there are three parts at the moment, but there could be more later on."

Traffic flow on campus also will be slowed during construction. Mid Campus Drive will remain open, but it will be limited to one lane from the Union to Anderson Avenue, and 17th Street will remain open, but it is expected to be limited to one lane while it is being widened.

Construction on the garage is affecting more than transportation. Some Union businesses are concerned that the construction might deter customers away from the area, Connaughton said.

"Just like when we remodeled in 1998, '99, and 2000, there always is a little concern that while you have a sense of upheaval, so to speak, that you may lose some people in the shuffle," Connaughton said. "We're trying to look at the positive aspect of it and look at how we can adjust and how we can make things happen."

The challenges arising from construction will affect everyone, but it also will change long-standing daily routines of K-State faculty.

Sociology professor dies

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

He spent a lifetime fighting for political change in his native country of Paraguay and teaching students, drawing from his experiences.

Marcial Antonio Riquelme, 70, associate professor of sociology and former director of the Latin American

Riquelme
SOCIOLOGY PROFESSOR

Studies program, died July 29 of a stroke in Asuncion, Paraguay.

Betsy Cauble, head of the Department of Sociology, Anthropology and Social Work, said Riquelme, known by many as Tonio, brought diversity and a wealth of experience to the sociology department.

"He was always able to bring a different perspective to the issues," Cauble said. "I think he will be greatly missed by the students. It's so important to have those different perspectives."

Riquelme started teaching at K-State in 1991. He also was a professor at the University of San Diego, three universities in Mexico and one university in Colombia.

Riquelme was active in the politics of Paraguay and other South American countries. Cauble said Riquelme was a renowned figure in Paraguay for his political action in the 1989 change in government from a dictatorship to democracy.

"Paraguay had a terrible dictator, and (Riquelme) was very political and spoke out against the government," Cauble said. "He has spent some time in jail, been tortured and has been through a lot."

Much of his research at K-State focused on studying government and social processes in Paraguay. He also was influential in building relations between K-State and Paraguay.

Riquelme served as director of Latin American Studies at K-State from 1991-96.

Bradley Shaw, director of international and area studies, said Riquelme was a role model to many Latin American students and was a significant loss to the program.

"He brought a life experience that was unique, and he related with students with the realities of his life," Shaw said. "I'm certainly hopeful we can find someone to replace what Dr. Riquelme brought to the department."

Riquelme was in the middle of a phased retirement. Shaw said Riquelme hoped to return to Paraguay to his family and work to improve the political climate there.

Cauble said they have not hired a replacement in the sociology department but have made arrangements for students scheduled in his class to move to different sections.

"As we move into a world that's smaller and smaller, to have somebody with such diversity like Dr. Riquelme to just sit down and talk to at the table, that is really great," Cauble said. "And we won't have that anymore."

Riquelme is survived by his wife Yolande, daughter Tania and son Jorge, all of Asuncion.

Cauble said his family will visit sometime this fall to claim his belongings.

She said she hopes to schedule a memorial service during their visit.

Harold Prins, distinguished professor of anthropology, attended Riquelme's funeral in Paraguay while beginning his sabbatical research there.

"Although Tonio's death was sudden and far too early in his still very active and active life, everyone was immensely grateful that Tonio had died while still in his beloved Paraguay and that he had just been able to celebrate his 70th birthday with family and friends," Prins said via e-mail to several K-State coworkers.

Student experiences sorority recruitment in different way

Newly inducted members of Pi Beta Phi rush toward their new sorority where current sorority members are waiting for their arrival during the Bid Day celebration Thursday morning. Women found out which sorority they were going to join that morning.

By Whitney Hodgkin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ashley Wagner experienced the three-day K-State sorority recruitment process from a different point of view than most women.

In the end, however, Wagner, a quadriplegic, got what she wanted — an invitation from Kappa Kappa Gamma to live in-house and become a member.

"I was worried they wouldn't accept me," Wagner, freshman in pre-professional business administration, said. "But all of the houses were very accommodating and welcoming."

Wagner was one of about 500 female students, mostly freshmen and sophomores, who asked and answered questions in 11 greek sororities to determine her best fit. Though she had to take into consideration the handicap accessibility of each house, Wagner said she felt comfortable in each.

"Kappa said they would do anything to make it possible for me to get into the house, but they're already accessible for the most part," she said. "I obviously can't get upstairs, so they carried me up themselves on bid day, which was really nice."

Sorority members begin planning for recruitment several months in advance to ensure as many girls as possible can get into a house they are happy with, said Kelsey Frasier, Kappa Alpha Theta president and senior in agricultural economics.

The results are announced on bid day, when new members are officially welcomed into the house.

"It's important to get everyone together to feel like a family," Frasier said. "We try to make them feel at home so they don't worry they made the wrong decision."

3 new locations meet needs of growing campus

By Cassandre Braden
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A new coffee shop, child development center plans and a challenge course were among the campus news highlights during summer break.

NEW COFFEE SHOP OPENS IN VACANT UNION SPOT

Caribou Coffee opened in early June on the second floor of the K-State Student Union, replacing Chillie Willie's Ice Cream Parlor. Three different businesses were looking to open a location in the spot including Radina's Coffeehouse and Bakery, Starbucks and Caribou Coffee, said Tina Griffin, Union senior food-service director.

Caribou Coffee was selected because of its flexibility regarding the sale of Call Hall

Ice Cream, Griffin said. "I definitely see (the coffee shop) as a gathering place for students," Griffin said. "They have a great product to offer the students."

Caribou Coffee is the third coffee shop to open in Manhattan during the last year. It is based in Minneapolis, Minn., and now has more than 460 U.S. locations.

NEW CHILD DEVELOPMENT CENTER TO MEET DEMAND

There is an increasing number of newborns in the Manhattan and Fort Riley communities, Debra Ring, Child Development Center director, said in a July 25 Collegian article. By 2009, a new child development center is planned to meet those demands. K-State's Child Development Center at Jardine Apartment Complex has existed since 1986. Ring also told the Collegian that infant care in Manhattan and Fort Riley is in a crisis situation. The projected capacity for the new facility is about 250 children.

CHALLENGE COURSE CREATES OPPORTUNITIES

K-State's challenge course had its grand opening June 1. Many of the actual elements were not yet in place, but it is now open for use, said Emily Lehning, assistant dean of Student Life and New Student Services coordinator.

Wildcat Warm-Up groups used the course this summer in early June. The course was built to give groups and individuals a chance to grow and develop as a team, Lehning said. The course is available to K-State students and faculty, nonprofit organizations and business groups. Rates start at $15 per person for a half-day session. Student Government Association provided the funding for the new course.

There are two levels on the course - a low course consisting of activities on the ground and a high-rope course. Hopeful campus and community groups will use the low course to develop teamwork and leadership skills, Lehning said. She also said the high elements are designed to test group support and to overcome fears.

"This is another way to host community groups," Lehning said. "There are already lots of things they can do on campus, whether it's at the Union, athletic events or exhibits. This is another compliment to the many different things we offer."

Adventures ahead Multimedia convergence tops Collegian's to-do list

Toward the end of the first semester of my sophomore year, I decided I hated K-State and was going to transfer. I loathed the color purple, the vile dorm food and the cow stench that tends to linger in town.

ALEX

I was completely ready to pack my boxes, ditch my parking pass and never look back.

However, before culminating my plan to blow the K-State popsicle stand, I applied to be on the Collegian staff. I began as a flustered and apprehensive reporter. I still remember lying to my editors and giving them lame excuses like "I can't come in to rewrite that story—I have an infant at home" or "Nope, I can't call that source back because I don't have a phone," to avoid having to cross the newsroom threshold.

Through the last two and a half years, I somehow managed to outgrow my newsroom phobia, and I've risen to positions like Edge editor (fall 2005), campus editor (spring 2006) and news editor (spring 2007).

I had originally planned to graduate and leave Manhattan in May, but at the last minute, I had a change of heart and decided to not only stay to earn a second degree, but also to be editor in chief of the paper.

I, like many editors in chief before me, have great plans for the semester. My staff and I want to push the edge of collegiate journalism.

The editorial staff is working to deliver news on a variety of platforms: print, online, radio and video.

We will strive to follow the industry trend of convergence.

We also are working to improve communication with the public and increase our accuracy and credibility.

We are constantly seeking better ways to serve our readers.

While I'm not necessarily excited for long, tedious hours of production, angry phone calls or other obstacles we might face this semester, it's all par for the course of running a college newspaper.

Luckily, I have a tremendous advantage, for I am among great company.

My staff is composed of talented, clever and diverse individuals. With everyone's abilities combined, we hope to provide readers with balanced, thorough and dependable coverage of campus and Manhattan.

With my crew in tow, I invite everyone to join the adventure while we the Collegian work to educate, entertain and intrigue our audience.

Local Mexican restaurant closes after Customs finds illegal alien employees

By Hannah Blick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For the second time in three years, the El Cazador Mexican restaurants in Manhattan and Junction City were closed when 18 of the restaurant's employees were arrested for working and living in the United States illegally.

On Aug. 16, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) personnel interviewed employees of El Cazador in order to determine if they were legally able to work in the United States, according to the Manhattan Mercury.

The owner of El Cazador, Santiago Paolino-Hernandez, who could not be reached, was arrested that day on charges of employing illegal aliens and using them for his own financial gain.

Police were also ready to arrest Santiago's brother, Luis Palolino-Hernandez on similar charges; however, he is believed to be in Mexico, according to the Mercury. The Riley County Police Department was unavailable for comment.

The first time the restaurant closed was in August 2004. Fourteen illegal aliens were discovered working at El Cazador. They were arrested and deported to Mexico. Santiago Paolino-Hernandez was also taken into custody on misdemeanor charges of employing an illegal immigrant.

Authorities would not release information on where he is being held or even if a bond has been set. Carl Rusnok, ICE spokesman at the Central Region office in Dallas, said Santiago is a permanent resident of the U.S., according to the Mercury.

Names and ages for the 18 El Cazador employees—17 men and one woman—are not yet available, and their status remains under investigation. The illegal aliens could be deported to Mexico anywhere from several days to several months, Rusnok said.

However, Rusnok and ICE officials would not discuss the details of their interviews with the employees, only that the employees did not have legal authorization to work in the United States, according to the Mercury.

HIT OR MISS | The editorial board selects Hit or Miss topics and writes them after a majority vote. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

HIT | 'SUPERBAD'

This is a summer movie worth watching that is not a sequel. The awkwardness of high school angst is captured very well in this fall-off-your-chair-laughing film.

MISS | PARKING GARAGE

Not only was the project started a month late, but the conditions the construction creates are hard to bear because of the limited number of spots available to students. If you are planning on driving to the Union this semester, anticipate hours of parking spot hunting and a lot of frustration.

HIT | HALE CAFE

What was the one thing missing from Hale until this week? A snack bar, of course. Hale will see the opening of the grab-and-go cafe today. It remains to be seen whether or not the students will clean up after themselves.

MISS | SCHOOL STARTING ON MONDAY

Does someone have a case of the Mondays? With the beginning of classes falling on the first day of the week, many will find it hard to bear them when so many negative events usually happen on this day of the week.

HIT | ONLINE TEXTBOOK LISTS

Just in time to buy books, Varney's finally made its book list available online. Students now have the option to find the cheapest and most convenient way to buy books before classes start.

MISS | EL CAZADOR

Widely regarded as the best Mexican food in town, El Cazador was shut down during the summer due to the hiring of many illegal immigrants. Students are now forced to look elsewhere when looking for cheap, delicious Mexican food.

Rove's departure from White House a sign of hope for future

All good things come to an end; and most bad things do too.

Karl Rove's tenure as right-hand man to President Bush is marred by what could be considered negative successes. Whatever President Bush wanted done, Rove made it happen. Unfortunately, while his actions achieved results, they also produced consequences.

Rove announced he was leaving Bush's staff last week, putting an end to a divisive chapter in U.S. politics.

According to CBS, the Bush/Rove relationship stretches back more than 30 years, and Rove helped Bush capture the Texas governorship 14 years ago. This was the first in a string of many Bush victories for which Rove was the "architect."

Most architects' work can be observed long after they retire. Rove is no different.

Helping Bush reach the White House in 2000 is, of course, synonymous with controversy. Helping the Republicans gain two seats in the Senate in 2002, as well as eight in the House, Rove was accused of dividing the nation with the simple goal of pushing an ideology.

Rove further divided the electorate in 2004 by casting war hero John Kerry as a cowardly flip-flopper.

During a time that is supposed to be the defining moment of our generation, we are hearing reasons why we should dislike, and even hate, our fellow Americans. If we disagreed on military action in the Middle East, we accused each other of being a warmonger or a terrorist sympathizer.

As the 2006 mid-term elections approached, Rove made clear his intentions of achieving a "permanent Republican majority," according to the Huffington Post from Nov. 16, 2006. The word "permanent" should have no place in any part of government, especially one as misguided as the Republican majority of the Bush presidency.

Rove and the Bush Administration were willing to do almost anything to pass their agenda into law, even if it meant dividing the nation, smearing opponents and accusing critics of being unpatriotic.

Luckily, Americans wised up to the rhetoric spilling from the White House and voted for change in November. However, not everyone will learn from the Rovean mindset.

Of all the critiques of Hillary Clinton, one of the only merited attacks was that she is too divisive. Anyone who stands in her way will be sorry, no exceptions. Clinton has criticized Bush for the very thing of which she has been accused. If the polls tell the truth, we could have four more years of being a house divided.

The Bush crew has gone over quite a makeover in the last seven years. Rumsfeld, Wolfowitz, Ashcroft and Powell are all enjoying more time with their families. Now Karl Rove can enjoy vacation time.

Congress and the American people now understand the Karl Rove way is the wrong way of doing things. Perhaps Bush will join this fraternity as well. No matter if he does or doesn't, Rove's architecture will stand the test of time, and like historians admiring the work of the Roman Coliseum, we will stand in awe of the sheer magnitude and magnificence of Rove's work long into the future.

Hopefully the Coliseum will have the longer life.

Parking decision made without thought of consequences

It is said when life hands you lemons, make lemonade.

And as of Aug. 6, K-State started making enough lemonade for the biggest sour-puss party known to student-kind — formally known as the construction of the K-State Student Union parking garage.

Driving up to campus today, students were likely greeted by the glaring orange vest fashion ensembles of several people new to K-State. Make no mistake, there is not a Village People convention in town, and these people are here to stay for a good 18 months.

For the next year and a half, the student body will be damned with inconvenient parking options with this indecent proposal. The decision to implement this garage was one of the most ill-conceived projects in terms of serving the student body, costing us hundreds of dollars by the time we leave K-State, and for what, a few extra spots on campus?

The concept of the parking garage was initiated by members of Student Governing Association last year. Though unsupported by a vote through Faculty Senate this spring, our peers forged ahead with the $17.5 million project.

Slated to become the next eyesore of the university by fall 2008, the garage will take precedent as the entryway of K-State over the iconic view of the Union. Aesthetics aside, faculty, students and guests have lost 400 parking spots to build the 1,400-stall facility, which only has 300 spots planned to be reserved for students. In the meantime, an interim shuttle service will herd students from the Bramlage Coliseum parking lot to the Union throughout the day.

Considering students are ponying up most of the dough to pay for the facility — entirely funded by campus parking fees — students would think all 23,000 Wildcats would get the better end of the bargain. (It's not like the student body doesn't have enough to pay for, with a $50 parking permit increase on top of rent, textbooks and the 8-percent tuition increase for 2007-08.)

Though not just a wallet-sucking eyesore, the most aggravating part of the parking garage installation is the timing. By delaying the planned construction timeline by more than a month, students will have to wait longer to see this four-story mass of concrete.

Like any other construction project, there are likely to be some unforeseen delays on top of this. On-campus students next year will begin to wonder if the parking permit is even worth the price due to such few spots.

Sugarcoat it as much as you want, Student Governing Association, university officials and anyone else involved in the project. You sold us a lemon.

So for those students who like to hit the snooze button and not wake up at the butt-crack of dawn, prepare to invest in some hiking boots — it's going to be a long walk to class.

New deli delivers cuisine variety

By Jaimee Keister
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The signature Southern sweet tea of McAlister's Deli has arrived in Manhattan.

With a menu of more than 115 items, McAlister's Deli offers something for everyone.

Sean Speakman, general manager at McAlister's Deli, said the menu consists of a variety of options, including sandwiches, soups and salads.

"The most popular is the Southern sweet tea," he said.

Another popular choice among the customers is the Texas Spud. The potatoes are about a foot long and can be served with a variety of toppings, Speakman said.

McAlister's Deli opened on June 11 and business is doing well so far, Speakman said.

"The sales for McAlister's Deli have been exceptional," he said. "With over 200 locations, Manhattan is one of the top 10 in performance."

Rhiannon Chubb, an employee at the deli, recommends the club sandwiches and sweet tea for newcomers.

"I love working here," she said. "I think it has a lot to do with the people I work with."

Customers had positive things to say.

"This was my first time, and I love it," Brittany Flesher said.

Flesher's favorite part of the meal was her sandwich, she said.

Sid Catterson also chose to eat at McAlister's Deli. He said a coupon prompted him to give it a try. He said he really enjoyed the sweet tea.

Speakman said McAlister's Deli is giving back to the Manhattan community by helping area schools with fundraisers. It also offers discounts to public service individuals.

Located at 427 Tuttle Creek Blvd., the deli offers gift certificates. The restaurant is open Sunday through Thursday from 10:30 a.m. to 10 p.m. Friday through Saturday it is open from 10:30 a.m. to 10:30 p.m.

Manhattan officials to visit partner city

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The two communities are a world apart and have large popularity, cultural and governmental differences, but because of one K-State professor, Manhattan and a small Czech Republic town have been linked for several years.

A group, including Manhattan mayor Tom Phillips and other city commission members, will visit Manhattan's partner city, Dobrichovice, later this month.

Dobrichovice is a town of about 3,000 people and is located about 12 minutes from the center of Prague, the capital of the Czech Republic.

Jeff Chapman, chair of the partner city advisory committee for the City of Manhattan, said the partnership began when former K-State business professor Joseph Barton-Dobenin moved to the Czech Republic to claim lost family land. He kept in contact with K-State and eventually volunteered to find a city with which Manhattan could develop a partnership. Barton-Dobenin, who taught at K-State from 1958 to 1985, also established a student-exchange program between K-State and Czech universities which sends numerous K-State students to two different universities in Prague.

"There's a long, rich tradition with K-State and the Czech Republic," said Phillips. "We hope to gain an understanding of their form of government and local education system."

Chapman, who also will make the trip, said the committee hopes to have a webcast between a third-grade class in Manhattan and one in Dobrichovice. The Manhattan group also will attend city commission meetings and familiarize themselves with the community. The group will leave for Dobrichovice Aug. 29 and return Sept. 4. All members of the group will pay their own travel expenses.

"The partnership is basically containing some interchange between some grade schools and eventually sharing leadership ideas," Chapman said.

Two years ago, former Manhattan mayor Ed Klimek visited Dobrichovice to establish the first face-to-face connection between city officials.

"They're just learning how to make government work under a free government," Klimek said. "I gave them some advice on what I would have done, and it was a great exchange of ideas."

Klimek said the infrastructure and government are still behind, because they were under restricting Communist control until the early 1990s.

Phillips said he hopes to lend advice to the young local government and gain a new perspective.

"They are having some of the same problems facing any local government like budgeting resources and making priorities," Phillips said.

A group of Dobrichovice city officials visited Manhattan to observe the city governments and communities.

Klimek said the trip should only strengthen the cities' relationship.

"They are very pro-America and want to be closer to learn how we do things here," Klimek said.

"They have a lot to learn from us, but we can still learn from them."

Sellers' splendid summer

Growing up, Scott Sellers never dreamed he'd win an NCAA championship. All he wanted was a scholarship.

But there he was, standing in the middle of the track at Sacramento State, celebrating a gold medal.

AUSTIN MEEK

And there I was, contemplating whether I could climb a chain-link fence.

It was a strange twist of fate that brought me to Sacramento State that day. I spent the summer in California, covering professional tennis and Little League baseball for a small suburban newspaper. On that particular June afternoon, I was writing a story on the pole-vault competition at the NCAA track and field championships.

That morning, I'd boarded the bus on J Street, notebook in hand. I spent most of the day wandering around, scribbling pages of notes I knew I'd never use, before finding a seat in the bleachers just in time for the high-jump finals.

I knew about Sellers, of course, knew about his monster jump at the Big 12 Outdoor Championships. But the first time I watched him sail over the bar in Sacramento, I realized there was something about Sellers that numbers couldn't quite communicate.

He sprinted across the track and sprung effortless over the bar, snapping his feet skyward at the last possible second. The smattering of fans in the stands, a generally uninterested bunch to that point, perked up and uttered a collective "wow."

"Man," I thought. "He's got a chance to win this thing."

Sellers wasn't the favorite that afternoon. Going into the competition, the top two jumpers were Andra Manson of Texas, who sounds like a comic book villain, and Donald Thomas of Auburn, who sounds like an accountant.

But nobody could touch Sellers in the NCAA finals. He nailed the first six heights on his first attempt and hardly seemed to break a sweat.

Just three jumpers remained at 7 feet, 7 1/4 inches — Sellers, Thomas and Manson. Sellers cleared the bar on his second try, leaving Manson and Thomas one jump to stay alive.

Manson came up short. Thomas clipped the bar. Sellers raised his arms in celebration, and I started eyeing that fence.

I had a general idea where to go — I just didn't know how to get there. After a day of getting thrown out of "athletes only" areas, I didn't have much faith in my ability to find the media entrance.

But given the high probability of bodily injury, I decided against scaling the fence and started looking anyway. I finally found the media entrance, an opening in the fence not much wider than I was, and jogged to the interview area.

A few minutes later, Sellers breezed through with the rest of the competitors. He apologized to the assembled

Prince expresses concerns after sloppy open football practice

By Jeffrey Rake
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Byron Garvin isn't saying the K-State football team had a tough time getting motivated for last year's opener against Division I-AA opponent Illinois State, a game the Wildcats narrowly won 24-23.

It's just that he thinks it might be easier this time around, with Southeastern Conference power Auburn, ranked No. 18 by The Associated Press, looming on Sept. 1.

"We were up for all our games, but we weren't nearly as excited as we are for Auburn," said Garvin, a senior defensive back. "Everybody will be waiting for this game."

If Saturday's open practice at Snyder Family Stadium was any indication, perhaps coach Ron Prince wouldn't mind having a few extra days to prepare.

Prince voiced displeasure with his team's lack of focus and concentration, which was evident during 11-on-11 drills. The offense looked out of rhythm, and after a pair of penalties, looked awfully tired as well. That is because they were sent to run stadium stairs for reinforcement, not once but twice.

Then there was the situation at kicker, a position Prince thought he had figured out just a few days earlier. But after his kickers displayed inconsistency on field goals Saturday, Prince was unwilling — or perhaps unable — to name a leading candidate.

"We're going to go through the next few weeks with the kicking duties (open)," said Prince, who acknowledged he's seen improvement on kickoffs. "From the place-kicking standpoint, I'm not very pleased right now."

Another problem area? How about left guard, where no player has emerged to take control of the spot. Sophomore Brock Unruh took some snaps with the first unit, but the position remains unsettled, according to Prince.

"It's an open tournament to see who can be the left guard when we go play Auburn," Prince said. "We don't have one."

MORAN LEAVES PROGRAM

Alphonso Moran, a potential starter at nose tackle in coordinator Tim Tibesar's 3-4 defensive scheme, has left the team and will return to his hometown in Delray Beach, Fla. Prince said he left for "personal reasons."

Moran, a junior, appeared in 23 games over the last two seasons and totaled 39 tackles. He earned first-team All-Big 12 honors as a freshman.

Strapped for depth at nose tackle, the Wildcats will likely turn to 6-foot-2, 296-pound senior Steven Cline to fill the starting spot. Cline appeared in all 13 games last year, finishing with 22 tackles and two sacks.

EXPERTS PICK K-STATE TO GO BOWLING

Think it's too early for bowl projections? Don't tell that to ESPN.com, where experts Ivan Maisel and Mark Schlabach unveiled their selections for each bowl game — everything from the BCS Championship Game to the Poinsettia Bowl.

Schlabach, who has K-State slated to play Kentucky in the Independence Bowl, said the Wildcats' schedule — which in addition to Auburn includes road games at Texas, Nebraska and Fresno State — is a concern.

"While the Wildcats might be better in Prince's second season, the record might not reflect the improvement," Schlabach said, adding that he thinks the Big 12 North is wide open. "But I'd be surprised if K-State didn't play in a bowl game this season."

Second-year coach Ron Prince talks with players during drills Saturday morning at Bill Snyder Family Stadium. The practice was the final open practice.

Maisel, for what it's worth, thinks K-State will make a repeat trip to the Texas Bowl and play Houston.

QUICK NOTES

— Sophomore Leon Patton and junior Deon Murphy are the likely candidates to handle kickoff- and punt-return duties, according to Prince. Patton was back at practice Saturday after missing last week's open workout in Olathe.

— The Wildcats think they have got quality depth in the secondary. Said senior Justin McKinney of the cornerbacks: "You can put any one of us out there, in my opinion, and get the same outcome."

— The 500 or so fans who showed up to the open practice need not worry about seeing a pooch punt every time K-State lines up for a long field goal. Asked why his team made a few punt attempts out of field-goal formation from beyond 45 yards, Prince said it was simply something he wanted to cover on his preseason checklist.

— If senior Tim Reyer continues to boom punts 70 yards — as he did on one attempt Saturday — perhaps the Wildcats will have another concern: out-kicking their coverage.

Sellers' gold medal tops list of K-State summer highlights

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The wide world of sports doesn't stop turning just because you're on summer vacation.

From Scott Sellers' memorable performance at the NCAA Outdoor Championships to the retirement of a K-State legend, here are five headlines you might have missed while you were gone this summer.

SELLERS SOARS IN SACRAMENTO

Sophomore high jumper Scott Sellers placed first at the NCAA Outdoor Track and Field Championships in June, clearing a height of 7 feet, 7 1/4 inches at the Alex G. Spanos Track Complex in Sacramento, Calif.

Sellers cleared the winning bar on his second attempt, edging Andra Manson of Texas and Donald Thomas of Auburn to claim the Wildcats' first outdoor national title since 1998.

Sellers came just short of the stadium record of 7-8 1/2, held by former Wildcat Nathan Leeper.

The victory capped an All-America campaign for Sellers, who won the Big 12 Conference outdoor title with a meet-record jump of

COLON ARRESTED

Sophomore center Luis Colon was arrested on charges of simple battery after an incident outside Hale Library on July 26.

Colon allegedly punched a fellow student after the two exchanged words outside the library.

"He hit him, there was a witness, and we arrested (Colon)," said K-State Police Chief Ronnie Grice.

An arraignment hearing is scheduled for Aug. 28 for Colon, who started 16 games as a true freshman last season.

This isn't the first punching incident for Colon, who was suspended after hitting California's Taylor Harrison during a game on Nov. 29.

VOLLEYBALL

Squad prepares for season opener with annual scrimmage

By Jon Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Fans got their first look at the K-State volleyball squad as the Wildcats opened their season with the annual Purple and White Scrimmage Saturday at Ahearn Field House.

The scrimmage featured several returning letter winners and six new members, including notable junior transfer Nataly Korobkova and senior captains Angie Lastra, Lauren Rosenthal and Stacey Spiegelberg.

As always, the fans were not the only ones trying to predict what the future holds for the Wildcats.

Coach Suzie Fritz was focused on the practice and managed to instruct both teams while also squeezing in some time for jotting down notes.

Fritz vividly remembers last year's scrimmage, when junior Rita Liliom suffered a season-ending knee injury.

Fortunately for the Wildcats, there were no casualties in this year's scrimmage. Liliom is ready to start the season but is still sporting a large black brace on her left leg.

Despite the 90-plus-degree heat in the coliseum, both teams competed through three games. The first game was tight with the Purple edging the White 30-28.

The White finished the second game on top with a score of 30-24 and the Purple closed out the match winning 30-23.

The Wildcats' first action of the season will be Aug. 24 at the Shocker Volleyball Classic in Wichita, where K-State will face the Mustangs of Cal Poly.

Campus movie event to offer more than just film showing

By Emily Sterk
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

A movie event has begun its third year on campus, averaging about 275 viewers and growing.

A four-week series with a different independent film every Sunday night is only part of the events taking place.

The second week of the "Movies on the Grass" series will feature the movie "Favela Rising," but before the film, AfroReggae, the band in the movie, will perform.

AfroReggae also will participate in a workshop in the morning and a lecture at 7:30 p.m. Aug. 27 in Forum Hall.

Rhondalyn Peairs, series coordinator, said "Movies on the Grass" does not appeal to only students but to a certain type of person: problem solvers, deep thinkers. She said it gives students a look at different perspectives on different issues.

This year will be different from past years, Peairs said, because it involves more activities but does not lose focus on the film shown and the message that accompanies it.

"Movies on the Grass" is a great way to learn about issues that you might not learn in the classroom," Peairs said.

In 2006, the film, "Invisible Children," which is a documentary about children living in Africa and dealing with poverty, hunger, war and the AIDS epidemic, showed during the movie series.

Katie Whitney, junior in anthropology, said she went to Uganda during the summer and volunteered at various orphanages.

"After the film, I went to the discussion and passed my extra copy of the film to someone who then showed it to (people in) the residence halls, so it does get spread around campus," Whitney said.

Peairs said the films are a way for the students to get involved with world-wide issues.

"After the film 'Invisible Children' played, students started making donations to the cause," Peairs said.

"Maxed Out" and "Yesterday" are the last two films that will show during the series.

"Yesterday" can be a promotion for the ONE campaign, also known as (RED).

"Maxed Out" is a film showing the difference between being wealthy and living in poverty.

"Favela Rising" is a message on how violence does not solve problems.

Sydney Smith, sophomore in fine arts, said she attended one "Movies on the Grass" showing in 2006 and enjoyed the atmosphere.

"It was a nice place to relax and meet new people," Smith said. "I also got to see friends I didn't get to see during the week."

WORLD NEWS

CANADIAN PRIME MINISTER TO ASSERT ARCTIC CLAIM IN SUMMIT

MONTEBELLO, Quebec — Canada's prime minister, Stephen Harper, is expected to assert his nation's claim to the fabled Northwest Passage through the warming, resource-rich Arctic at talks with President Bush starting Monday.

Canada claimed the passage in 1973, but competition to control the Arctic has intensified with global warming. Shrinking polar ice has raised the possibility of new shipping lanes and development of what one U.S. study suggested could be 25 percent of the world's undiscovered oil and gas.

Russia sent two small submarines to plant a tiny national flag under the North Pole this month. Harper went to the Arctic earlier this month and announced Canada will build a new army training center and a deep-water port in the Northwest passage.

The summit involving Bush, Harper and Mexican President Felipe Calderon is about expanding economic cooperation among the three nations, but Harper will assert Canada's claim during a private meeting with Bush, Canadian officials said at a press briefing on the summit.

HURRICANE PUMMELS
JAMAICA AS CATEGORY-4
STORM; FEW TAKE SHELTER

KINGSTON, Jamaica — Hurricane Dean pummeled Jamaica with gusting winds and torrential rains Sunday after the prime minister made a last-minute plea for residents to abandon their homes and head for shelter. Many residents ignored the call, however, while tourists holed up in resorts with hurricane-proof walls.

Dean, which already had killed eight people on its destructive march across the Caribbean, triggered evacuation calls from the Cayman Islands to Texas, and forced the Space Shuttle to cut short its mission. Cruise ships changed course to avoid the storm, but some tourists in Jamaica could not get away before the island closed its airports late Saturday.

The National Hurricane Center said the first hurricane of the Atlantic season was projected to reach a Category-5 classification with sustained winds of 160 mph before crashing into the Cayman Islands on Monday and Mexico's Yucatan peninsula after that.

The Mexican mainland or Texas could be hit later.

ISRAEL REJECTS REFUGEES, WHICH SOME SAY SHIRKS RESPONSIBILITY

JERUSALEM — Israel said Sunday it no longer will allow refugees from Darfur to stay after they sneak across the border from Egypt, drawing criticism from those who say the Jewish state is morally obliged to offer sanctuary to people fleeing mass murder.

Israel has been grappling for months over how to deal with the swelling numbers of Africans, including some from Darfur, who have been crossing the porous desert border.

The number of migrants rose to as many as 50 a day, according to the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees, apparently as word of job opportunities in Israel has spread.

The rise led to concerns that the country could face a flood of refugees if it does not take a harsher stand on asylum seekers.

FEMALE GERMAN HOSTAGE FREED IN AFGHAN POLICE OPERATION

KABUL, Afghanistan — Afghan police freed a female hostage from a neighborhood in the capital Kabul and arrested a group of kidnappers early Monday, an Interior Ministry spokesman said.

The 31-year-old German captive was abducted from a restaurant on Saturday, and the operation to free her took place near the area of western Kabul where she went missing.

"A group of kidnappers were arrested," said the ministry spokesman Zemary Bashari.

Earlier in the day, the captive, who identified herself as Christina Meier, appeared on a video pleading for help.

FRENCH FOREIGN MINISTER PAYS UNANNOUNCED VISIT TO BAGHDAD

BAGHDAD — France's foreign minister paid an unannounced and highly symbolic visit to Baghdad on Sunday — the first by a senior French official since the war started and a gesture to the American effort in Iraq after years of icy relations. Bernard Kouchner said

Paris wanted to "turn the page" and look to the future.

Kouchner said he was not in Iraq to offer initiatives or proposals but to listen to ideas on how his country might help stop the devastating violence.

"Now we are turning the page. There is a new perspective. We want to talk about the future. Democracy, integrity, sovereignty, reconciliation and stopping the killings. That's my deep aim," Kouchner said after meeting with Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari.

Many music styles influence young Manhattan band

By Nicholas Birdsong
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Starting out as a couple of high-school kids who decided to play music together, the Violet Lights have formed something special in Manhattan's local music scene.

Five members make up the group, each with diverse backgrounds and tastes in music that meld together to form a sound that is distinctly Violet.

The lead guitarist Spoon Moulds is heavily influenced by blues and rock styles. Artists like Stevie Ray Vaughn and Led Zeppelin inspired Moulds to pick up the guitar.

"I was in eighth grade, and I was talking to my mom about music she used to listen to in high school," Moulds said. "She said Led Zeppelin, so I had gone downstairs and found a Led Zeppelin CD. The first song on there was 'Black Dog.' The guitar riff was so catchy to me I was like, 'I have to learn how to play guitar.'"

Spoon Moulds and Dalton Hearts were the first two in the group. Hearts, who plays drums, is influenced by a wide variety of styles as well.

"I think you can find all of our influences in our songs, like rock, funk, blues, jazz and stuff like that," Harts said. "It all kind of comes together."

As well as being the drummer for the band, Hearts also does most of the song writing.

Six months after Moulds and Hearts began playing together, Aliyah Stephens joined as guitarist and keyboard player. Stephens was asked to join the group because she previously had played with Moulds.

"It was like, the Summer of '04," Stephens said. "I knew Spoony before that. I had been in a band with him in middle school that didn't work out. So I met Dalton through Spoony."

Stephens lends a more jazzy and funky musical sensibility to the group with her keys and guitar. In some songs the keyboard seems to lend from classic rock groups such as the Doors.

Kelley Tracz, bassist for the Violet Lights adds a more modern and alternative rock bass style to the group.

"I try to concentrate on listening to the bass lines of songs," Tracz said. "It's awesome to see what others do, and I try to incorporate that."

Tracz joined the Violet Lights as a matter of chance.

During a practice session about two years ago, the bass player for the group at the time did not show up. Meanwhile Tracz was riding her bike and got lost. Happening upon the group, Tracz filled in as bassist and has been doing so for about two years.

Otto Bieber joined the group not long after Tracz.

Bieber does the main vocals and guitar for the Violet Lights and describes his influences as being very varied.

"There are just so many influences," Bieber said, "like the different genres of music like blues and funk and anything we can kind of throw in there. Being with other good musicians also influences what I do."

Queens make 'sarcastic' 5th album

"Era Vulgaris"

Album review by Mark Sibilla

I was introduced to Josh Homme and his band Queens of the Stone Age about the same time everyone else was introduced to the band: during the summer and fall of 2002, when "Songs for the Deaf" was released and the hit single "No One Knows" was flooding rock radio.

This was the year of my musical "awakening," or when I truly began to love music and wanted to find as many new artists as possible. Queens of the Stone Age were particularly important to me at this point in my life; the band showed me a type of heavier-sounding music that I could enjoy, even though, at the time, I never would've guessed that I would like metal or hard rock.

Since then, Queens of the Stone Age have let me experience the "Feel Good Hit of the Summer." I followed the band through the loss of bassist Nick Oliveri, and I stayed with Queens of the Stone Age during the release of its dark, fan-alienating album "Lullabies to Paralyze."

Now Homme has released his band's fifth album "Era Vulgaris," an album full of the type of sarcastic, hook-filled stoner-rock the Queens are known for. "Era Vulgaris" is not a retread of past albums. The band manages to take what it does best and make it more potent while managing to experiment and squeeze new sounds and textures into each song.

Perhaps Homme sums up the sound of "Era Vulgaris" best with a line from album track, "Make It Wit Chu": "I ain't here to break it, just see how far it will bend."

"Era Vulgaris" opens purposefully with "Turmin' on the Screw." After a short introduction of a powerful kick-drum laying down the beat, a grand Led Zeppelinesque guitar line barrels in. Homme is at his cynical best lyrically, as he takes clichés, and, through a clever manipulation of his own, makes them funny and memorable.

A few gems are, "They say those who can't just instruct others and act like victims or jilted lovers," and "You want a reason? How's about because? You ain't a has-been if you never was." The song's midsection features a mind-melting guitar solo that segues into a wave of layered guitar lines, which take the song to its final verse.

The second song, "Sick Sick Sick" is one of two lead singles for the album. The lustful song ("Lose the halo ... With a lick of your lips and my grip on your hips") is surprisingly danceable and gallops in on a thrash-metal guitar line, a pummeling bass and driving percussion. The only questionable decision is the inclusion of The Strokes' Julian Casablancas during the last chorus of the song — his nasally voice doesn't gel well with the guitar thrashing that surrounds it.

The UK's lead single, "3's & 7's," starts with a freewheeling guitar lick before careening into a Lynyrd Skynyrd-like guitar line. The song isn't quite as in-your-face as "Sick Sick Sick," but it is the better single (though both are quite excellent). "Sick Sick Sick" is a more straightforward, though much heavier, track, while "3's & 7's" better showcases Homme's excellent guitar work and songwriting prowess.

"Make It Wit Chu" is, hands down, the album's best moment. It lies in the middle of "Era Vulgaris" as a respite from the album's first half and a palette cleanser for the album's second half.

It is an up-front love song that rides along on an easy beat, a bed of shakers and a simple piano melody. The song is then peppered with Homme's guitar and keyboards that give the song depth and atmosphere. The lazy beat and song's simple lyrics are perfect at mimicking a Stax or Motown love song.

"Era Vulgaris" is a triumph of an album. The songs are bursting with interesting ideas, and each song is distinct enough from each other that the album is never a boring listen.

1st-ever engineering rally promotes involvement within college

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sara Jost transferred into K-State's College of Engineering during the spring semester, but she learned about what the college offers outside the classroom Sunday night.

Jost, freshman in mechanical engineering, attended the first-ever pre-semester pep rally at the engineering plaza and atrium. Jost said she signed up with Career and Employment Services and learned about internships at the rally.

She said she also learned about the different departments within the college, in addition to joining the study abroad program and Women in Engineering.

"I wish I'd known more applicable information and how it can be used outside of a textbook environment," Jost said about her first semester at K-State.

On the night before the first day of classes, the College of Engineering's New Student Orientation Seminar used to take place in a roundtable format at the K-State Student Union, said Assistant Dean Tom Roberts. Each department within the college now has its own semester-long orientation program, Robert said.

The dean's office, department heads, Engineering Student Council and Career and Employment Services worked together to create a rally with prizes, games and information booths, Roberts said. About 700 incoming students were expected to attend Sunday's rally, he said.

"We think it's important for freshmen to meet our older students," Roberts said. "It's an important part of the community-building process."

Several engineering student organizations also had their projects on display at the rally, including the solar car, mini-baja car, solar house, steel bridge, concrete canoe and 1/4-scale tractor teams.

New students are encouraged to sign up and participate on the teams, Roberts said.

"We think it's important for our students to connect on campus," he said.

Zach Maier, senior in computer engineering, organized the rally's student volunteers through the Engineering Student Council. Maier said the rally's purpose was to provide incoming engineering students with a welcoming, light-hearted atmosphere before the semester's start. While all engineering students were invited, Maier also said he hopes the rally includes more upperclassmen in its future.

"We just want to make them feel comfortable with their first week at K-State," Maier said. "They can get critical information they need to survive the first week of classes."

In addition to learning about different organizations and tutoring opportunities, Maier said the rally replaces the classroom format of New Student Orientation Seminar.

"We don't necessarily want to go to a class the night before classes start," he said. "We want to keep the fun and games going as opposed to just the homework and assignments."

Mary Smith, junior in pre-professional architectural engineering, said she hoped the rally would attract more students to join the Engineering Student Council.

"It's great because you get to meet different organizations all in one room," said Smith, Engineering Student Council director of development. "You can meet us and start getting involved now, which there is no better time than the present."

Students interested in information about the K-State Solar Car ask questions while looking at the project during the Engineering Rally on Sunday evening in the engineering complex.

With more than 2,800 students in the College of Engineering, Smith said it is important to meet engineering students in the college's nine departments.

"It's great to meet fellow engineers, even if they're not in your major," she said. "It's a great place to network."

2 couples balance married life with college, deal with challenges

By Dawn Murphy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Chad and Kristen Geri knew each other eight months when they got married at dawn on the beach in Sydney, Australia, six years ago. Though they had met in person just three months before they married, they had been communicating through calls and e-mails for several months.

"We met each other online through a movie review site," Kristen said. "We just hit it off right away."

Five months after their initial meeting on the Internet, Chad decided to fly to the United States from Australia to meet Kristen in person for the first time.

"We've never been apart ever since," Kristen said. "From the first moment we saw each other, we both pretty much knew - that we were meant to be together."

Chad is now a third-year student in veterinary medicine while Kristen works to support both of them.

Like many students who are married while in college, the Geris have struggles with which they have learned to cope throughout their marriage, including their finances.

"We apply for financial aid since vet school is so expensive," Kristen said. "It's not that bad though if you can make a budget and stick to it."

She also said that they lived in the Jardine Apartment complex previously in order to save money.

Kebing Yu, a graduate student in mechanical engineering, also deals with marriage struggles while in college.

He said he thought one of the biggest challenges of his marriage was finances.

"I support my family through my GRA assistantship. My wife is not working right now - but she wants to apply for her master's soon - so she'll probably be working after she graduates."

He said he and his wife have no children and are waiting until they are financially stable.

Yu said he first met his wife in an English-language class in China.

"We've been married for about a year," Yu said. "I love her goodness."

Chad said another issue people should consider before marriage are the virtues of being single. However, he said he has absolutely no regrets about his marriage.

He also said that through his marriage he has had to learn how to handle conflict.

Chad said he used to handle conflict poorly, because it was easy for him to snap and bicker at someone when he was exhausted and overwhelmed.

However, the Geris have found ways to communicate better with one another.

"We credit our Christian faith as a factor that has made our marriage such a strong, long-lasting one," Kristen said.

"The only regret I have is that we didn't get pre-marital counseling. I don't think our expectations were as realistic as they could or should have been for the first year or so of our marriage."

Kristen added that finding time to spend with her husband is also something with which the couple struggles.

"Vet school can be very time-consuming - but we find ways to deal with that," she said.

Yu said another challenge he must contend with is being in a foreign country in general.

"Most of the challenges are listening to and speaking English," Yu said. "There are also major cultural differences between China and the U.S."

Yu and his wife like to do many things in their free time.

"We meet friends, play tennis, do research and help out with the Chinese Student Association," he said.

President Jon Wefald watches the K-State Marching band give a special performance in December 2006. The band put on a similar performance Friday.

Band performs for Wefald, Anderson Hall employees

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A thunderous "Go K-State" echoed throughout campus Friday morning as the K-State Marching Band marked time to the beat of the drumline.

The band, joined by the Classy Cats, marched toward the south side of Anderson Hall for a brief performance for campus employees and students.

Director Frank Tracz directed traffic while the band crowded the street and lined up for a three-song performance.

Employees and students hurried out the doors of Anderson Hall, with President Jon Wefald in the lead, to watch from the building's steps, as others joined the on-lookers along the sidewalk.

Lisa Hund, senior in art education, is a student employee in Anderson Hall and joined others on the steps outside the building to watch the performance. She said she had watched the traditional performance in years past while working at Anderson Hall.

"It's just amazing the sound that they get," she said.

Hund said the band always performs when Wefald is available to watch.

Robert Auten, assistant registrar of information technology in the Registrar's Office, was one of the observers on the sidewalk.

"I've never experienced watching them play in front of Anderson Hall like that before, and it was phenomenal," he said.

Auten said the performance was an example of the hard work that gets the band ready for the semester as it represents K-State.

Throughout the performance, the crowd clapped along while the energetic performers continued entertaining them with their playing and dancing.

When the music ended, Tracz thanked the crowd and called out to the band, "Let's get to work."

As quickly as the performance had begun, the band marched away and everyone cleared the streets, including the employees that hurried back to their offices to continue their work.

The street was quiet and empty, just as it had been minutes before the performance began.

As the band made its way through Bosco Student Plaza to continue its practices for the day at Memorial Stadium, the beat of percussion and rhythm of marching feet could still be heard by all on campus.

Studying abroad provides K-State students with new perspectives

By Dawn Murphy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Many students decide to study abroad during their college career. Though they decide to do so for different reasons, each experiences the life of a different culture and are removed from their comfort zone. Three K-State students spent a semester living in a different country and can now reminisce about the different lives they once lived.

SURVIVING COSTA RICA

Carly Wagner, senior in Spanish education, studied abroad in Heredia, Costa Rica, in spring 2007.

"Costa Rica is such a laid back country," Wagner said. "In fact, when I came back to the U.S., I had reverse culture-shock - it took me about a month to readjust to the fast-paced, stressful lifestyle here."

Wagner said she went to Costa Rica through the University Study Abroad Consortium program and took classes with other Americans at La Universidad Nacional de Costa Rica.

"Only two of our classes, Tropical Ecology and a cultures class, were taught in English," she said.

Wagner said she lived with a host family during her time there. She had three host sisters; two lived at the home with her, while the third sister already was married.

"My sisters were 21, 18 and 11," Wagner said. "My host parents were great, and I became really close with my host mother."

During her free time, she took trips every weekend to different beaches, rain forests and volcanoes throughout the country.

"The people there are so humble and friendly, ready to help out whenever you need it, no questions asked," Wagner said. "If anything, it opened up my eyes and made me realize, in retrospect, that I don't need all the material things I used to think I needed - people there are so gracious and happy."

BRAVING THE OUTBACK

Katie Johnson, fifth-year student in nutritional science and pre-optometry, studied abroad in Newcastle, Australia, in spring 2006 when she went with a group of about 50 other Americans from across the United States.

Johnson said she took precautions before going to Australia by not seeing any horror or true-story movies about the Outback.

"Basically, I just wanted to focus on the positives - having an adventure of a lifetime - not on any possible negatives," she said.

Johnson, like Wagner, said she experienced reverse culture shock.

"People and businesses are laid back in Australia," she said. "They'll have holidays for just about any reason, and business will shut down for the day, and families will typically go to the beach. Australia is a very family-oriented culture."

Johnson said she noticed that most Australians did not go to college. Instead, they become certified in a field after only a few years of experience.

Johnson said one experience she had that reminded her that she was not in the United States was when she and one of her friends walked into a bar the first night and requested Foster's beer. The bartender looked dumbfounded and informed them that they didn't have any Foster's beer.

"However, upon traveling to Melbourne later on, we did find a bar that carried Foster's, but it was an American-ized bar," Johnson said.

EUROPEAN BACKPACKING

Carl Bellinger, senior in food science management and agricultural economics, studied in Prague, Czech Republic, in spring 2007 where he lived in a university dorm and had a Czech roommate.

"One thing I've noticed about Czech students there is that they're more family-oriented. They typically don't graduate until they're 25 years of age and usually get their master's," he said. "A lot of them still live at home, or if they live in the dorms or something, go back to visit their family every single weekend."

Bellinger said the people of Prague mostly speak English and no knowledge of Czech is necessary to travel or study abroad there. He added that all his classes were taught in English.

While abroad, Bellinger said he and a friend went backpacking through most of Europe in their spare time.

"We went just about everywhere," Bellinger said. "Germany, Greece-you name it."

Bellinger said he did experience an embarrassing moment while backpacking in Rothenberg, Germany.

"Our backpacks were getting heavy so we set them behind the bushes and came to retrieve them later. When we came back, they were gone - this big, 6-foot-5 German dude came up to us and said 'stupid!'"

Bellinger said his favorite thing in Prague was pilsner beer.

"In the Czech Republic, that's the best beer around," Bellinger said. "And even though it's imported here to America, the Americanized version is not the same; it's watered down."

Student volunteers lighten load for new residents

By Whitney Hodgkin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

While they were not paid for their efforts, about 30 volunteers hauled luggage and furniture for more than 500 residents from the curb to their residence hall rooms.

K-State offers the service to help control the influx of students, parents and vehicles on campus and to make move-in day less stressful for those involved, said Greg Brown, co-coordinator for the move-in crew and senior in philosophy.

Brown said the volunteers were allowed to move in Thursday, while other residents could move in a day early—Friday—for a $50 fee.

Students who waited until Saturday didn't have to pay, but they were subject to longer lines for the elevators, sweeter lobbies and the possibility of losing first-come, first-served privileges to their roommate.

"Most campuses don't have a move-in crew," said Van Zile Hall Governing Board President Meghan Snodgrass, another co-coordinator for the move-in crew and senior in human ecology.

"Parents and students moving in by themselves were really appreciative."

Wal-Mart shopping carts and portable storage bins were traded among residence halls to lessen the number of trips made from cars.

Snodgrass said Wal-Mart lets K-State borrow the carts for move-in day every year, and they are given back when school starts.

Greta Kliever, sophomore in pre-journalism, worked more than the three two-hour shifts required of the move-in crew.

She was a front lawn mover, which was someone who unloaded everything from curbside cars so drivers could quickly get out of the way.

"I had to carry someone's pet tarantula out of the car for them," Kliever said. "I usually try to keep my distance, but I wasn't going to say no. It was pretty cool."

Other members of the move-in crew shuttled drivers from their designated "R" parking lot back to the residence halls so they could finish the process as efficiently as possible.

Brown said as move-in crew co-coordinator, he had to ensure things were done quickly and efficiently.

"The move-in crew were some of the first people freshmen encountered, so it was important to make a good first impression," Brown said. "They could see that K-State has a community that cares."

Students gain experience through internships, find job opportunities

By Dawn Murphy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Internships provide students with work experience in their respective fields in order to learn the skills needed to succeed in today's world.

Three K-State students found internships locally, regionally and internationally where they made connections and gained experience.

MAKING GLOBAL CONNECTIONS

Nick Sutcliffe, senior in marketing, participated in an 11-week internship for the U.S. Department of State at the U.S. Consulate in Belfast, Northern Ireland, this summer.

His official title was Commerce/Political Intern. He did everything from discussing the role the U.S. Department of Commerce played in the United Kingdom, to meeting with individuals from the Northern Ireland Chamber of Commerce and Industry and discussing its role in Northern Ireland and how it interacts with American companies.

"The most challenging thing for me during the internship was trying to have meaningful conversations with officers at the Consulate who knew more than I did," Sutcliffe said.

"At times I was briefed on an event only moments before I walked into the door. So I had to be up to speed quickly."

Sutcliffe said the internship helped him learn how to manage his time, go after what he wants and organize events on a large scale.

"I can foresee a career with the Department of State in a number of years after I have sufficient experience on a global scale," he said. "The career has an exciting pace, not to mention that moving every three years from different posts around the world—globalizing myself—really appeals to me."

SIFTING THROUGH THE PAST

Sarah Finney, K-State graduate in geography and history, interned at the Andersonville National Historic Site and the Riley County Historical Museum while at K-State.

"Andersonville is a museum dedicated to POWs of all the wars the United States has been involved in," Finney said. "It was initially a prison site where Union prisoners of war were sent during the Civil War."

Finney said her duties at the Andersonville National Historic Site included researching historical diaries and memoirs written by POWs from WWI to the Vietnam War and then transferring the information to a genealogical database.

She said her job with the Riley County Historical Museum was similar.

"I researched genealogical and historical information found in newspapers dating back to about 1800, and then I recorded vital information such as marriages, and divorces, deaths, and births into a database," she said.

Finney said she enjoyed the research at both places and would take a job at either one if offered.

She added that the work she did while interning has led her to more research projects.

"I was required to write a 20-page paper for the Internship in History class at K-State," Finney said. "I did mine on allegedly haunted places in Manhattan, such as Eureka schoolhouse, and it was fun."

What Finney found most fascinating about interning at the Riley County Historical Museum was looking at old newspapers.

"Actually being able to turn the pages of a newspaper over 100 years old is very cool," she said.

WORKING BEHIND THE SCENES

Drew Gaschler, senior in marketing management, has interned with Learfield Communications since fall 2005.

"I sort out the game tickets, help host the VIP tents for football and basketball games, deliver tickets to clients, and make sure the office is full of supplies," he said.

Gaschler said he also worked with client accounts on Excel and is in charge of radio avail, which is where he makes sure all people who want personal radio access to the broadcasts of the games has them.

"It's a paid internship, and I work under the general manager here," he said.

Gaschler said he may want to work there someday, and if the company offered him a job he would take it.

"What I like most about interning here is interacting with people during the games and doing all the behind the scenes type of stuff," Gaschler said.

said he enjoyed a reserve stall in front of Kedzie Hall since 1989.

However, parking services annexed his spot to provide adequate handicapped parking near the Union. Although he will be inconvenienced, he said he was happy to comply with the request.

"It's the price of progress," Johnson said. "Parking has always been a problem here at Kansas State. I'm just one person of many; this is something we'll have to do to handle the inconvenience."

Although the planning for a parking garage was discussed for decades, its reality is a new experience. In that regard, Connaughton said Union officials are open to comments and suggestions from community members.

"If somebody has a concern about what we're doing, we have an open door and an open line if there's some creative suggestions to how we can improve a shuttle system during the next 18 months," Connaughton said.

"We're all in this together, and trying to get through it and minimize the inconvenience is pretty much what we're looking for — hopefully it works out that way."

recruitment vary from fulfilling a life-long dream to reluctantly following in the footsteps of a family member.

Caitlin Burns, freshman in pre-journalism, said she decided to go through recruitment to meet people since she is from another state.

"It was a stressful but very good experience," Burns said. "I'm glad I did it even though I didn't get my first preference. It's going good so far."

Burns received a bid from Sigma Kappa on Thursday which she said did not disap-point her.

"If I could change anything about recruitment, I'd recommend getting the opinions of the recruits more, so more girls get into their top choice," she said.

Wagner said she will move into the Sigma Kappa house once some minor arrangements are made.

"This is something I won't get the chance to do again," she said of living with so many other girls who share her interests. "I hope to make life-long friends who can be there for me any time, any place I need them, and I think I can do that here."

journalists — myself and a guy with a video camera — and promised to return for interviews before disappearing.

The camera guy smirked. "Are you going to stick around?" he asked me.

"I guess," I replied.

"Good luck," he said as he turned to go. "Once they're gone, they're gone. They never come back."

I'm used to athletes blowing off interviews. Heck, I'd probably do it too if I was on the other side of the notepad. But for some reason, I believed Sellers would come back. So I waited.

A few minutes later, he reappeared from the crowd.

We talked for a few minutes, and it was clear the entire situation hadn't quite sunk in for Sellers. He was humble and soft-spoken.

"I knew coming into the meet that if I jumped well I could definitely place in the top three, but when it actually happened I was overcome," he said. "I was blown away."

We shook hands, and I offered my congratulations. As I turned to go, Sellers called out one last request.

"If you see a guy with a camera, could you send him my way?"

BASKETBALL TEAM ADDS THREE, LOSES TWO

WALKER EARNS MEDICAL REDSHIRT

Chances are, an extra year of eligibility won't mean much for K-State forward Bill Walker, who has said he hopes to enter the NBA draft after the upcoming season.

But if Walker decides to put his NBA dreams on hold, he'll have four more seasons to play at K-State after receiving a medical redshirt from the Big 12 Conference.

The 6-foot-6 forward joined the team in December and appeared in just six games before suffering a season-ending knee injury on Jan. 6 against Texas A&M.

'MR. K-STATE' STEPS DOWN

Nearly six decades after he captained the Wildcat basketball team to the national championship game, Ernie Barrett retired from his position as K-State's director of development in June.

Barrett played professionally with the Boston Celtics before returning to K-State as an assistant basketball coach. He served as athletics director from 1969-76 and spearheaded fund-raising efforts to build the Dev Nelson Press Box and renovate Ahearn Field House.

K-State hired former baseball coach Mike Clark to fill the vacancy in the university's fund-raising group. Clark will conduct major-gift fundraising for facility projects.

Sunset Zoo houses one of oldest grizzly bears in captivity

By Cassaundre Braden
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

At first glance, Brownie looks like any other bear. But look a little closer, and it's obvious that he is special.

The large grizzly bear is beginning to lose some hair, and his brown coat has a dull sheen. He is most often seen lying about or lounging in his small blue pool.

Brownie lives at Sunset Zoological Park; he is believed to be 55 years old. He might be one of the oldest bears in captivity on record.

"I can remember first seeing him in 1983 when we moved here," said zoo patron Terry Wickham, adding that Brownie looked aged then as well.

Grizzly bears typically live to about 40 years in captivity, according to National Geographic.

Sunset Zoo is a member of the Association of Zoos and Aquariums, which keeps a record of the ages of all of the animals in AZA-accredited zoos. The exact age of Brownie is not certain because he is a retired circus bear that the zoo acquired in the 1960s, said Ella Todd, marketing assistant at Sunset Zoo.

"We have children that are now 50 and 60 years old that come to visit the zoo from around the country because they grew up with Brownie," said Todd, senior in marketing. "It's interesting to hear stories from community members about Brownie."

Recently the zoo acquired a video clip of Brownie, submitted by a family who visited the zoo in the 1960s or '70s. It shows Brownie in his younger years.

Brownie lives in the same exhibit he lived in when the zoo first acquired him. His living environment only has been updated for security and comfort purposes.

Sunset Zoo is open 360 days a year from 9:30 a.m. to 5:00 p.m.

Brownie is said to be one of the oldest living bears in captivity. He is estimated to be 55 years old.

PRISMACOLOR

Chinese ambassador to be 1st scheduled Landon speaker

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Chinese ambassador to the United States will be the 150th speaker of the renowned Landon Lecture Series.

Ambassador H.E. Zhou Wenzhong, elected in 2005, will speak at 10:30 a.m. Oct. 10 in McCain Auditorium.

Zhou's title is Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the People's Republic of China to the United States. He has served in several respected Chinese posts throughout his career, like Vice Minister of Foreign Affairs, Minister of the Embassy to the United States and ambassador to Australia, Barbados and concurrently to Antigua and Barbuda.

"It's an excellent start because it continues the tradition of have excellent public figures in our series," said Charles Reagan, Landon Lecture Series chairman. "I think it's important to having outspoken people from China and Saudi Arabia and Japan to talk about their relations with the United States."

Reagan said there are three main draws at K-State for the ambassador. There is a large Chinese population on campus; China, which has had product issues lately, is one of the United States' biggest trading partners; and China is a growing military power in the world.

Zhou is one of several acting ambassadors to speak at K-State. Saudi ambassador Prince Turki Al-Faisal spoke Jan. 26, and Japanese ambassador Ryo-zo Kato spoke Oct. 18, 2005.

As of Monday, no other speakers have been scheduled, but Reagan said another speaker already has accepted an invitation.

The Landon Lecture series is entering its 41st year. The series has featured the last seven presidents at some point in their political careers and also has featured other politicians, journalists and foreign leaders.

Reagan said there is no other collegiate speaking series like the Landon Lecture Series.

"When you look at all the universities, everyone gets one or two big speakers but to have so many, like the Landon series, is incredible," Reagan said. "Ask yourself, if it were easy, why doesn't every university do it?"

Crime discipline varies

By Lacey Altwegg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Open container, disorderly conduct, minor in possession or even public urination are among crimes that might carry a penalty ranging from community service to a $1000 fine.

But students might think twice before committing these crimes if they are aware of the damage it can have on their bank accounts.

The city of Manhattan's court systems are divided into three sections: Pottawatomie County, Riley County and the City of Manhattan.

Therefore, the punishments for individual crimes can vary depending on the location of the crime and which police force makes the arrest.

For example, according to Student Legal Services, being charged with a minor in possession in Manhattan will tentatively cost $78 to $135 in court costs with a $300 diversion fee. In Riley County the usual fees are a $60 to $128 court costs, with a $300 diversion fee, a $200 fine and $85 for Alcohol and Drug Information School.

These terms are gray, because the consequences of the crime are ultimately up to the judge of that county.

Students might consider a minor in possession to be less severe than a minor in consumption, but according to Student Legal Services Attorney Sarah Barr, they are similar.

"The statute reads a person under the age of 21 cannot possess or consume alcohol at anytime," Barr said.

According to a pamphlet Barr provided, a diversion is a contract into which one enters with either the City of Manhattan, Pottawatomie or Riley counties, agreeing to complete a diversion program and upon successful completion of the program, the charges will be dismissed. When one enters into a diversion, they give up the right to a speedy trial, the right to confront and cross examine witnesses and the right to a trial by jury.

According to a local law office's Web site — Huser and Smith, attorneys at law — diversion programs can be offered to first-time offenders by the prosecution.

"An application must be filled out to be accepted into the diversion program," Barr said. "It is up to the prosecutor's discretion if you are allowed to participate in the program."

Not all crimes offer a diversion program. Disorderly conduct and a second offense of a minor in possession or driving under the influence are examples. In Manhattan, there are no diversions for charges of using a fake ID, transporting an open container and furnishing alcohol to minors.

A Student Legal Services pamphlet states that a person charged with a DUI could be asked to complete 20 hours of community service, report to a diversion officer and attend Alcohol and Drug Information School for 12 months, depending on the prosecutor.

Making a change

Staff hopes new cafe in Hale will draw more to library

By Erin Fisher
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The tradition of a no food or drink policy in Hale Library ended Monday with a new grab-and-go cafe on the first floor.

The K-State Student Union will provide the cafe with food items like pre-made sandwiches, pastries and fruit. Tina Griffin, Union food service director, said Au Bon Pain soups and Starbucks drip coffee and espressos also will be served.

"I think (the students) will like the convenience and the product offering that we have," Griffin said.

Today final day for open theater auditions for K-State's fall productions

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

Panos Travlos, freshman in open option, and Nicole Diehl, freshman in fashion design, rehearse lines for "Stop Kiss" outside Nichols Hall on Monday. Auditions will continue Tuesday with callbacks on Wednesday.

By Monica Castro
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Today is the last day of open auditions for fall student theater productions at K-State.

Auditions will continue at 7 p.m. in Nichols Hall for fall performances at McCain Auditorium, Nichols Theatre and the Purple Masque Theatre in East Stadium.

"Everyone is welcomed, any major," said Michael Gros, assistant professor in speech communication, dance and theatre. "Last year we had freshmen on stage in their first year. No experience is needed."

Students are not required to bring a memorized monologue or song for the audition, Gros said. Those auditioning can bring music for the accompanist, but Gros said it must be within the student's singing range.

Raynal Cherenfant, junior in theater, said he has auditioned for shows in the past. He said the auditions usually are in groups, and when auditioning for the musicals, students can sing in groups of four.

Cherenfant also said since the auditions are "cold" reading, which is reading a script for the first time, there will be plenty of people to practice with.

"For the musical auditions I have a song prepared, because the director likes it when you have stuff prepared," he said.

Marci Maullar, associate professor in speech communication, theatre and dance, said there will be several auditions for the four shows.

The productions this year will be "Fiddler on the Roof," "Stop Kiss," "Down the Road" and "Scapino."

There will not be any more auditions for the fall semester productions, and all positions will be cast after tonight's auditions.

Gros said that very late Tuesday night, the directors will have the cast list and call-backs posted.

For those who miss auditions for the fall term, there will be auditions later in November for the spring productions.

PACK TO SCHOOL

Check out this list to see which backpack is for you.

OSPREY STRATOS 40 BACKPACK

The overachiever

Though typically used for long hiking journeys through the mountains, this model would work perfect for the student taking 30 hours of class this semester. The several different compartments also will allow you to keep those 10 classes organized.

$148.95

O'NEILL H2 SOLAR BACKPACK

The Nerd Pack

If you can't live without your iPod, then this is the backpack for you. Solar panels on the pack allow it to charge your MP3 player or cellular phone. It also can turn off your iPod when you get an incoming call.

$337.23

BURTON LIQUID LOUNGER BACKPACK

The Party Pack

This model is every tailgater's dream come true. It comes with a water resistant, AM-FM stereo, which has the capability to play MP3s. There's also a compartment for shot glasses and a lined cooler compartment. Did we mention this bag turns into a chair?

$129.95

BULLETPROOF MESSENGER BACKPACKS

21st-century Pony Express bag

Are you all about protection? This new model will increase your chances of making it to class in one piece. The fact that it's waterproof also ensures that it's built to last.

GRAVIS METRO BACKPACK

The Trendsetter

So maybe all the gadgets and gizmos just aren't your thing, and all you really want is something trendy. While this model isn't quite as high tech as its counterparts, it still does provide plenty of options to store your stuff and a stylish look.

City to discuss emergency shelter

By Nicholas Birdsong
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

City leaders will debate the future of the new Manhattan Emergency Shelter at the city commission meeting 7 p.m. to-night at City Hall.

The project was initially brought before the commission in October 2006 but unexpectedly high construction costs have forced shelter management to ask for additional funds, according to city officials.

"The low bid was $260,000 more than the estimate," said Ron Fehr, Manhattan City Manager.

The commission will vote on accepting the construction bid from Ron Fowles Construction Management Services Inc. and consider the shelter's request to waive permit and utility fees for the project, according to city officials.

The Manhattan Emergency Shelter also will request an additional $260,000 grant.

The new shelter would double the capacity from 25 to 50 individuals, said Mandy Chapman-Semple, executive director for the Manhattan Emergency Shelter.

Actual capacity is more limited because families have their own rooms and non-relatives are not permitted to sleep in the same room.

"We are turning away a lot of people due to lack of bed space," she said.

More than 150 people were turned away in 2006 and 100 this year due to lack of bed space, Chapman-Semple said.

Besides housing homeless and other special-needs people, the Manhattan Emergency Shelter provides an array of services such as transitional living to permanent housing, she said.

Construction on the new facility would begin 60 days or less after accepting the bid, she said.

The new shelter would be completed about 300 days after it starts. Operations would begin as soon as the construction was over, Chapman-Semple said.

Commissioners also will discuss the first reading of a storm-water regulatory ordinance.

Boyda greets city residents, addresses concerns

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nancy Boyda literally kicked off her business shoes and spoke openly yesterday to a group of about 20 area residents on the issues they wanted to know about.

Boyda, the representative for the 2nd District of Kansas, talked to the group of mostly senior citizens Monday evening at the Riley County Senior Services Center as part of her series called "Congress on the Corner," which is a town-hall style meeting with one-on-one conversations following.

"It's to take our office to the cities in the district," said Boyda's district manager Jason Fizell. "It's not to gain support, just an outreach. She wants to hear what the people's issues are."

Boyda addressed several topics throughout the night, explaining the issues and her work in Congress on these issues.

One of the first topics addressed was immigration reform. Boyda said the main issue of immigration reform is the lack of enforcement of illegal immigration laws.

She said her solution to the problem is implementing a whole new social security-card system. She said this card would be used for proof of U.S. citizenship when looking for jobs or receiving government money.

To get this card, Boyda said, people need several sourced documents, like a birth certificate. Anybody seeking employment would need the card.

"It's basically saying, if you don't have a card, you have a problem, and if you want a job, you won't be able to get one," Boyda said.

Several questions also William Smallwood, Manhattan resident, talks with 2nd District of Kansas Rep., Nancy Boyda, Monday evening at the Manhattan Senior Center as part of "Congress on your Corner." Boyda started the event by answering questions from the crowd and then had one-on-one interviews with attendees.

asked dealt with the issue of healthcare and Medicaid. Boyda said the main issue of Medicaid and prescription drugs was the growing presence of mail-order prescriptions, which take out the personal attention of local physicians by putting them out of business, Boyda said.

"When I first entered Congress, there were three counties that had no local physicians," she said. "Now, there are seven."

On the issue of healthcare, Boyda said the system is "grinding to a halt." She said funding is being cut and there are too many corporations making too much from the system.

"I don't take a single plan for several reasons," she said. "I really don't know what the answer is - there's just so many out there."

Throughout the meeting, Boyda also foreshadowed what could be a chaotic fall Congressional session. Boyda said the dissenting party, mostly Republicans, will do whatever is in their power to bring down bills on many of the issues Congress will address, like healthcare, the war in Iraq and others that will affect Kansas more directly, like farm subsidies and alternative energy.

"I can see one of two situations: the house descends into chaos, or the four Republican representatives - if they don't get on what's best for Kansas - something is going to happen," Boyda said. "Hold on to your hats this fall."

Boyda finished her speech talking about the war in Iraq and terrorism. She said there are few options left for Congress but to redeploy the troops.

"When you look at the numbers, we don't have enough troops, and we will redeploy," she said. "We have extended ourselves to a point where we can't handle anything more."

After the hour-long meeting, Boyda sat down with several citizens individually, addressing the issues they wanted to ask her about.

Boyda has conducted nearly 40 "Congress on the Corner" meetings.

Fizell said the meetings usually do not attract younger citizens. That is why he said the Boyda team has considered scheduling a meeting at K-State to specifically address students' issues.

TO THE POINT

Find parking solutions

One thing on which we can all agree on is that the parking garage has created many problems for those needing to get around campus. The complete shutdown of the parking lot south of the K-State Student Union forced hundreds who usually park in the lot to find another spot.

Mid Campus Drive also has been re-tooled to allow one-way traffic only. Students and faculty returning to campus after a summer away were met with an unexpected change to an often-traveled road.

Faced with these problems, it is easy to be distracted by the inconvenience of the garage and not focus on ways to adapt to the changes.

There are many other ways to handle the mess.

The first is to utilize the shuttles being offered. The first shuttle leaves from the east parking lot at Bramlage Coliseum starting at 7 a.m. and the last will leave to return to Bramlage at 6 p.m.

If students need to be near the Union in the evenings, the Union is sponsoring a shuttle that will run from 5:15 to 9 p.m.

Another way to cope with the mess is to leave for your destination earlier than usual. This is a good opportunity for students to work on time management. Also, consider taking the extra time and walking to campus, or get a bicycle or a motor scooter for more accessible parking. At the same time, you'll be polluting less.

These are just a few ways students can make the transition to the parking garage seem less severe.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Jess Boatwright | COLLEGIAN

K-State students can learn from KU ideologies

I spent the summer only 85 miles away from Manhattan, but it felt more like 1,000.

I was immersed in a culture completely opposite of Manhattan's. Every street I ventured down in Lawrence and every party I attended shed light on something I had never experienced in Manhattan.

The ideologies, experiences and student population in Lawrence are so distant from Manhattan, I sometimes forgot I was still in Kansas. This feeling was because of one major difference: the conservative, somewhat-sheltered nature of Manhattan and the liberal, free-thinking nature of Lawrence.

Since conservative communities are more set on their values, they lack one key factor to objectivity: free thought. Lawrence residents seem to have it, and Manhattan needs it. Kansas students seem to see both sides and let logic run its course.

Everyone from Kansas knows

Lawrence is liberal and Manhattan is more conservative, but that simple discrepancy makes a world of difference. Thoughts of religion, political issues, drugs, music and even career choices are vastly different between towns.

I noticed those differences in three main areas of the community: the downtown area, student perceptions and drug use.

The downtown areas of the two communities are not comparable. Lawrence has a bustling downtown with a solid music scene, a variety of storefronts and numerous restaurants.

During lunch breaks over the summer, I walked up and down Massachusetts Street to watch people interact. People ranged from suit-attired businessmen to perpetually high, homeless hippies. Though there was a variety of people, all seemed to have similar demeanors and weren't too worried about trivial issues. Most of what I saw was people thinking, whether it was in the middle of a philosophical conversation or just sitting there.

The people walking down Massachusetts Street and Kansas students have much the same aura. Any conversation I had with a student opened my eyes to deeper thoughts about issues like religion, politics and other controversial ideas. They definitely had a different opinion on issues than most K-State students, but the KU students weren't exclusive to those sides — they knew both sides.

This might be my liberal ideology seeping through, but it seems the conservative, Christian majority of K-State has shaded its eyes and thoughts from nature and sometimes logic.

I also had that mentality in Manhattan unknowingly. Yeah, I'm a liberal, but I didn't really think about issues too much — I just followed what I thought liberals did in Lawrence or anywhere else. It was more than that in Lawrence though. Many, but not all, Kansas students seemed to think more about the issues and specifically of how they affect people's lives. I'm not saying those in the K-State community don't care about other people, but they just don't think as much and are far less active on issues.

A reason for this proliferation of thought in Lawrence could be the higher drug use. Sure, there are drugs in Manhattan, but I learned of several drugs in Lawrence I hadn't even heard of before. This might not be great for the users, but it shows one key difference between the communities. More Kansas students aren't afraid to explore new experiences and thoughts. Sure there are several severely messed-up people wandering Massachusetts Street due to drug abuse, but there is also a feeling Kansas students and many Lawrence residents have from examining issues more evenly and clearly.

It might be hard to learn from Kansas, though. K-State and Kansas students have such an animosity and built-up stereotype against each other that they don't want to act the same or even think the same.

It's time to throw those stereotypes and inhibitions away. There's so much people don't want to know, they don't care to know or can't know, but we can think about them and hopefully make our own determinations, not follow those of our parents, peers or pastors.

Gay ministers depict hypocrisy of doctrine upon which Lutheran Church was founded Religion is at the heart of many political debates; however, politics recently has prodded its way into the Lutheran church, creating a strong division between members.

Unfortunately, members of the Evangelical Lutheran Church of America have spat on the work of Martin Luther by dragging homosexuality into a religion that fought hard to combat the problems arising from a religion guided by politics.

The New York Times covered a week-long biennial meeting of the church-wide Assembly of the ELCA over the "ordination of openly gay men and lesbians," which was to decide whether to overlook a person's sexual preference when involved in the Lutheran ministry.

The resolution brought incorrigible results for those steadfast in the original intentions of Luther's works.

The Lutheran Church is divided into two main sections. The ELCA focuses on a loose interpretation of God's word.

The Missouri Synod, on the other hand, believes strongly in the literal translation of the Bible and is opposed to homosexual ministers based on the writings of Luther.

Lutheran CORE-coalition for reform — an alliance of pastors, congregation and reform groups — has been working ardently to preserve within the ELCA the Lutheran doctrine.

Its mission statement states, "We are committed to working for a consistent implementation of Vision and Expectations throughout the ELCA, one that will provide a ministry of oversight and discipline for all rostered leaders within our church."

According to Fox News, CORE Lutherans said, "Bishops will now feel more secure in ignoring denomination policy."

Those wishing to allow homosexual ministers are able to change an entire religion with one word: tolerance.

Luther wrote the 95 Theses according to his belief that political corruption was tarnishing Christian doctrine. His condemnation of the Catholic Church led to the Protestant Reformation, which was supposed to solve the problems instigated by the Catholic Church's hierarchy.

Luther thus wrote his catechism, which became the basis for the Lutheran religion.

In his evaluation of the sixth commandment — thou shalt not commit adultery — he states we should "honor marriage as God's institution, the life-long union of one man and one woman."

He also wrote, "God forbids sexual sins such as rape, homosexual activity, incest, child abuse, obscenity ..."

Based on Luther's writings, homosexuality is clearly not in conjunction with the Lutheran faith. Meanwhile, the ELCA continues to disregard the word of God, except those phrases, which do not conflict with sins they find to be acceptable.

Luther wrote, "We despise teaching the word of God when we do not use the word of God and the sacraments; when we use the word of God and the sacraments negligently and carelessly."

According to the Lutheran faith, the ELCA is deriding God's will by placing man's fallible reasoning above all else. The problem herein is this wishy-washy attitude might work for a lot of interdenominational parishes, but in the Lutheran Church, people should follow the word of God through the Bible and Ten Commandments.

An all-loving God does not necessarily mean he is accepting of all behavior.

As ministers, homosexuals make a mockery of the Lutheran church and their doctrine, creating the biggest disgrace to befall the Lutheran faith since its institution.

1st day of shuttle service runs smoothly

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Parking services' first operational day of parking shuttles ran smoothly Monday, a university official said.

"I haven't heard of one trouble," said Gary Leitnaker, assistant vice president of human resources and parking. "It's being better used the first day than we could've imagined. I'm pleasantly surprised with everyone who's riding today (Monday)."

Leitnaker said he was surprised about the number of K-State students and faculty who knew about the shuttle service, which is running due to the 18-month parking garage construction north of the K-State Student Union. The shuttle will be operational during the entire construction process, he said.

K-State had three 15-passenger buses and a van operating the shuttle from the K-State Student Union to Lot 9 near Bramlage Coliseum Monday. A new bus replaces the van today.

Donald Kis, full-time employee with parking services, said Monday was his first day driving a bus full of passengers. Between 7 and 10:30 a.m., Kis said he had about 40 passengers, and he had about 85 total people from 7 a.m. to 2 p.m.

The shuttles run every five to seven minutes, Leitnaker said. He said he recommends students and faculty build a little extra time into their daily schedules to accommodate for shuttle times.

Kis said he recommends students keep in mind that the shuttles only drop students off at the specified drop-off points.

Monday also marked the end of the 50 temporary parking spots in front of the Union. Prior to the construction, there were about 400 parking stalls in the Union lot, and about 1,400 spots will be available in the garage, Leitnaker said.

The Union also operates a second shuttle service from 5:15-9 p.m. from the Memorial Stadium parking lot. Leitnaker said he recommends students utilize the West Stadium parking lot and other open lots on campus for any Union activities after Parking Services' shuttle ends at 6 p.m.

The shuttle service's operational cost for Parking Services is about $700,000 each year, which is budgeted into Parking Services' operational costs for this year and next year, Leitnaker said.

While Parking Services initially had planned to lease school buses from USD 383, the university instead bought two buses from Colorado and California and decided to use the two it already had.

However, Leitnaker said if the shuttles start filling up more, university officials have discussed leasing additional buses from USD 383.

Students from Jardine Apartment Complex and Uni-

Lisa Meyer, front, and Clare Seip, both seniors in architectural engineering, board the parking shuttle bus the north side of the K-State Student Union on Monday afternoon. The two were taking the shuttle to their cars, which were parked in the lot near Bramlage Coliseum.

Christopher Hanewinkel

versity Crossing Apartments especially utilized the shuttles, Leitnaker said.

Nina Sanchez, senior in elementary education, said she rode the shuttle to and from campus Monday.

Prior to this academic year, Sanchez said she was able to walk to classes since she lived on-campus. Because of the shuttle schedule, Sanchez said she had to make some accommodations in her part-time job schedule.

"I'll probably have to work something out so I'm not late to work everyday," she said.

Sanchez also said she was considering alternatives to the shuttle like parking near campus or riding a bike.

Restaurant to reopen after owner's jail release

By Hannah Blick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Despite losing 18 employees to U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, El Cazador Mexican restaurant plans to reopen.

Police recently released Santiago Paolino-Hernandez, owner of the El Cazador Mexican restaurants in Manhattan and Junction City, from jail, and Paolino-Hernandez plans to reopen at least the Manhattan branch of El Cazador in the next few weeks, said S. M. Samarra, the executive vice president of S & S Development Co. and El Cazador's property manager.

Paolino-Hernandez was indicted on Aug. 12 and arrested Aug. 16 for employing 18 illegal immigrants in his restaurant and using them for private financial gain. Information was not released on Paolino-Hernandez's bond. However, Samarra said he felt Paolino-Hernandez was innocent.

"(Paolino-Hernandez) didn't know they were here illegally," Samarra said. "He had no way of knowing."

Paolino-Hernandez would not comment on the situation but met with Samarra and a lawyer on Monday to discuss his plans to reopen, Samarra said.

Samarra also said a relative of the restaurant owner will come from South Carolina to help him with the legal issues surrounding the reopening of El Cazador.

Samarra would not say specifically when the restaurant would be open for business.

"It will reopen as soon as possible, but I cannot say for sure," he said. "They are now investigating the other branches in St. Louis and Kansas City, so it may take a while."

Tight end Norwood suspended following arrests

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Rashaad Norwood, a senior tight end for the K-State football team, was suspended following two arrests Sunday morning.

Coach Ron Prince announced the suspension in a statement Monday afternoon.

"We have high standards that our players need to be held accountable to," Prince said in the statement. "Rashaad will be suspended, and his overall standing with the program will be reassessed after the judicial system has run its course."

Norwood

Norwood was arrested on multiple charges stemming from a domestic dispute, said Riley County Police Lt. Kurt Moldrup.

The charges include damage to property, domestic battery, criminal trespassing and obstruction of the legal process.

Early Sunday morning, Norwood allegedly forced his way into the apartment of a female victim, using a chair to break a sliding glass door. After a heated verbal altercation, Norwood forced his way into a locked bedroom and pushed the woman to the bed, Moldrup said.

After learning the police had been called, Norwood fled the apartment and was apprehended after a foot-chase, Moldrup said. He was released on $2,000 bond and instructed to stay away from the female victim.

Later Sunday morning, police were called to the same residence, where they reportedly found Norwood hiding under a bed. He was arrested again and released on $3,000 bond, Moldrup said.

A projected starter at tight end, Norwood finished second on the team with 36 receptions last season behind senior wide receiver Jordy Nelson.

Worn-out Wildcats a good sign

One by one they walked off the practice field toward the Vanier Football Complex, helmet in hand, each step a bit more agonizing than the one before it.

Some of them made it to the entryway, where showers and a change of clothes waited inside.

Others, however, got caught in the tangled web known as the media.

Justin McKinney, a senior, was one of those forced to stay behind. He politely answered questions while propped up on a ledge outside Vanier. His feet were planted in a puddle, presumably from the afternoon rain. Then again, it could have been the sweat from his forehead. He didn't care.

Another victim was senior Byron Garvin, who kept inching closer and closer to Vanier's comforting doors before yet another media member would ask him for an interview. He obliged, of course, but no reporters complained of running out of ink.

Even Josh Cherry, a kicker, took one of his interviews sitting down. And just when he thought he was finished, another reporter held him for a few extra minutes. This time he had to stand.

So by now you get the point. K-State's football players, after spending much of their August in training camp and having to endure one final two-and-a-half hour practice, couldn't wait for it to be over.

Marcus Watts, a senior, called camp the toughest he's been through. He and his teammates looked exhausted, especially during what turned out to be a sub-par practice session.

Snap were fumbled, field goals were missed and those yellow flags seemed to come out quite a few times.

Yet despite the poor showing, it was encouraging to see so many players physically spent afterward. It tells me they were pushed to their limits. That's a good thing.

Nobody wants to see players come out of training camp looking well-rested and polished. That would suggest they didn't invest much time into the offseason program.

Instead, you want to see players showing signs of struggle. You want them to be beat up and bruised. Most importantly, you want them to remember the grind.

Because when it's the fourth quarter, and it's a road game, and the whole team is tired, they'll have to turn to something.

Coach Ron Prince, you'd think, will hope they turn to each other. Bold and Daring will only take you so far. At some point X's and O's will have to yield way to blood and guts.

In the 11 days leading up to Auburn, the Wildcats will get their energy back, regroup and focus on what they want to accomplish. They know it won't be easy. Nothing worth achieving ever is.

Players talked confidently after Saturday's practice about their expectations for the season. They genuinely think they can steal what many consider a wide-open Big 12 North Division. Prince has stated his goals are higher, especially after making a visit to San Antonio, site of the Big 12 Championship game, in late July.

And if the Wildcats have been able to lay any sort of foundation in training camp, something they can build upon in the weeks and months to come, then perhaps they'll have a shot at something special.

Certainly they won't take the challenge sitting down.

Volleyball coach, team look for fresh start after disappointing 2006 season

By Jon Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The 2006 season was not a pleasant one for the K-State volleyball team, as the Wildcats finished 11th in the Big 12 Conference.

No one took the dismal season harder than coach Suzie Fritz. But after losing just one senior from last year's squad, Fritz said she can see the light at the end of the tunnel.

"We are more veteran," Fritz said. "All of those kids have another year of experience."

Fritz also said she believes this year's squad has stronger leadership, starting with captains Angie Lastra, Stacey Spiegelberg and Lauren Rosenthal.

"I like our senior leadership. I like their vocal leadership. I like the leadership they are providing by example," Fritz said. "Since 2003, I think these are the strongest leaders we've had."

For Fritz, the leadership starts with Lastra, a senior libero.

"There is nobody better than Angie," Fritz said. "She is the spark. She makes a play that gets everyone going."

K-State opened last season ranked 25th in the American Volleyball Coach's Association/CSTV Poll, but finished with a 12-18 overall record and a 4-16 Big 12 Conference mark.

"The 2006 season was hard on us all. It's hard on the kids. It's hard on the coaches. It's hard on you," Fritz said. "We couldn't have been working any harder to try to find ways to get wins."

The Wildcats hope to improve their fortunes this season with six newcomers:

Players optimistic in spite of difficult practice week

By Ryne Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As storm clouds moved over Snyder Family Stadium after Saturday's open practice, coach Ron Prince saw something in his team.

"The guys are tired," he said. "They look tired and weren't very sharp today. Our tackling has improved over the last week, but we've put them through a pretty hard week, and obviously, they don't look very sharp today."

The fatigue was noticeable early in practice when players were walking instead of running up stairs during punishment for fumbling.

Exhaustion is expected during training camp, said senior Marcus Watts.

"Everybody in the nation is tired," he said. "I, for one, am mentally tired and physically tired. This has probably been the toughest camp I have been through."

Despite the fatigue, Watts said he believes the team is learning a valuable lesson.

"It is something that is good for you, because it allows you to see what your limits are and to push your limits to realize that you go a lot farther than you really can," Watts said. "I think a lot of players, including myself, thought they couldn't do it, but when I got out there, I practiced hard and tried the best I could and a lot of players did the same thing."

Senior Jordy Nelson had an idea on how to rest up after camp.

"We just got to take care of ourselves and not do stupid things at night," he said. "Just

Financial assistance still available to K-State students

By Jaimee Kelster
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Stacy Reeves said she did not apply for financial aid last year until September.

Reeves, junior in family studies and human services, said she waited for her parents' tax information.

"After I filled out the form, it only took three weeks for me to get the money," Reeves said. "It really did not cause me any problems."

Several options still exist for students who have not applied for financial aid for the 2007-08 academic year, said Larry Moeder, K-State admissions and student financial assistance director.

The options still available to students are grants, student loans and student employment opportunities. Students can apply at any time for financial assistance, as long as it is within the academic year, Moeder said.

"There are really very few forms of financial aid that are so limited in the amount of money that is available that the student would miss out on," Moeder said. "A lot of money is available. The key to it all is the student needs to get out there and apply."

About 70 percent of K-State students receive financial assistance through grants, scholarships, student loans and work-study programs, Moeder said. The university receives about $170 million a year in financial assistance. K-State's priority date to apply for financial aid is March 1, and students are considered for federal and state aid, he said.

The first step a student needs to take to receive financial assistance is to fill out the Free Application for Federal Student Aid. Students can fill out the FAFSA form online at www.fafsa.ed.gov, or they can fill out the paper form, Moeder said.

Grants are similar to scholarships and do not have to be repaid, according to the SallieMae Web site.

There are two types of student loans available. One type is a federal student loan. Federal student loans are available through private financial institutions, according to SallieMae.

The other type is a private student loan. They provide students with additional funding when their federal loan eligibility runs out, according to SallieMae.

The Federal Work-Study Program is another form of financial assistance available to students. The program provides jobs for undergraduate students with financial need, allowing them to earn money to help pay education expenses, according to SallieMae.

K-State has two work-study programs for students, Moeder said. The Federal College Work Study program is when the government pays most of the student's salary, he said. This makes it easier for students to get a job since the university does not have to pay their salary; however, students must demonstrate a financial need, Moeder said.

The other work-study program is the Campus Student Payroll. The university pays students' full salaries, and all students are eligible for this program, Moeder said.

Moeder said he recommends that students just apply to see where they stand, and they should not assume they do not qualify. Even if students are not ready to use financial assistance, it is a good idea to fill out the application so they have one on file, he said.

Students also need to keep in mind that the FAFSA form is not a one-time application, and students need to reapply for financial assistance each academic year, Moeder said.

Robby Flack, junior in political science, said K-State's work-study program provides him a job with a flexible schedule. It also allows him to earn as much as he needs without inconveniences, he said.

"Work study is only one of the ways I receive financial aid," Flack said. "I also have several grants and scholarships from both K-State and the state of Kansas. I think K-State has an excellent financial aid department and offers a lot to K-State students."

IRAQI GOVERNOR ASSASSINATED AS SHIITE BATTLES BUILD IN SOUTH

BAGHDAD — A roadside bomb killed a governor in southern Iraq on Monday, the second provincial boss assassinated in nine days and a likely prelude to an even more brutal contest among rival Shiite militias battling for control of some of Iraq's main oil regions.

Iraqi police blamed the attack on the powerful Mahdi Army, whose fighters are nominally loyal to radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr but recently have splintered as breakaway factions set their own course.

The showdowns in southern Iraq — pitting Mahdi groups against the mainstream Shiite group in parliament — could intensify as the British forces overseeing the south gradually withdraw in the coming months.

ALLEGED RAPE OF BOY SPURS CALL TO CHANGE FRENCH LAW

for a halt to early prison release for some pedophiles after a 5-year-old boy was allegedly raped by a repeat sex offender who had been prescribed Viagra while behind bars.

The boy was kidnapped from his home in the northern town of Roubaix on Wednesday and allegedly molested by convicted pedophile Francis Evrard. The 61-year-old, convicted three times, was released from prison in July.

BOLIVIAN PRESIDENT TO GIVE HALF PAYCHECK TO PERU QUAKE VICTIMS

LA PAZ, Bolivia — President Evo Morales said Monday he will donate half his monthly salary, about $950, to help victims of last week's earthquake in Peru.

As part of a campaign to collect money and supplies for Bolivia's Andean neighbor, Vice President Alvaro Garcia will also donate half his paycheck, while Cabinet members and other government officials will chip in 25 percent, Morales said.

"We cannot abandon our Peruvian brothers," Morales said.

Student volunteer recruits others to work with area youth

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Cierra Elder has made volunteering a commitment. She has helped organizations locally, nationally and internationally, and now she is recruiting students to follow in her lead.

Elder, senior in biology, has been a student coordinator of the academic mentoring program at the Community Service Program for three semesters.

"I basically am a line of communication and offer opportunities to K-State students to do youth service and mentoring in grade schools in Manhattan," she said.

Monica Parrish, special assistant in civil leadership, said Elder had been involved with many of the organization's programs.

"She is an example of the types of students that are drawn to our program," she said.

Parrish said CSP is an organization branched under leadership studies and programs in the College of Education.

She said Elder's responsibilities include recruiting and training students to be academic mentors.

"We're really working to revamp this program because it's become kind of stagnant," Parrish said.

She said the program's communication with the participating elementary schools and mentoring centers is an area that needs improvement; however, she said the academic mentoring program's directors are working to better the communication between the mentors and schools.

Parrish said Elder has an advantage as a student coordinator because she started as an academic mentor and has been able to see both sides of the program.

"She's really good at working with other students," Parrish said. "She's very organized and has a lot of good ideas."

Elder said the academic mentoring program usually involves a total of six to seven grade schools and tutoring centers.

"I'm responsible for talking to them and seeing what those needs and wants are and matching those needs and wants with what the K-State students can do," she said.

Elder said the program has a required workshop that mentors attend in the semester, and the mentors also turn in monthly time cards and fill out an evaluation at the end of the program.

As a coordinator, Elder said she has balanced her responsibilities with part-time jobs and school in the past.

"It's all about time management; all college students know that," she said.

Elder said she has volunteered for many activities throughout college and high school.

This past summer she volunteered at an orphanage in Brazil for eight weeks with the CSP's International Team.

"I loved it because it was a chance to learn outside the classroom," she said.

Mary Tolar, associate director of leadership studies and programs and director of civil leadership, said CSP also provides students with leadership opportunities.

She said while the students contribute to the program, they also benefit by gaining leadership skills.

"We think it's very valuable as an educational opportunity," Tolar said.

Tolar said many of the students who begin volunteering for CSP stay committed to the program and continue serving.

She said Elder works about 15 hours a week, and her work is done mostly in the CSP office.

"She needs to be available to the mentors as they come in," she said. "Much of the work that she does is through communication and record keeping, although, there are often site visits that take her off campus as well."

Elder said there are many opportunities for students to get involved. She suggested they look at the CSP's Web site or call the office.

"Something to remember is that we have day activities, and we also have the mentoring program that allows students to put in whatever their schedule allows," she said.

She added that volunteering has benefits for students.

"It's great for getting a job," she said. "There are so many jobs that are service oriented, and if not, you're always working with people in some way."

Parrish said a volunteer center that is based out of the Community Service Program is also available for students.

"If students want to serve on a regular basis, the center would be a good way to get involved," she said.

Tolar said the volunteer center will also have student coordinators that will also give students an opportunity to volunteer.

New state driver's license law spurs concern over uninsured drivers

Associated Press

WICHITA — A new state law that recently went into effect, making it harder for illegal immigrants to get driver's licenses after July 1, has raised concerns that it will increase the number of unlicensed and uninsured drivers in Kansas.

An estimated 15,000 immigrants could be affected by the new law.

That is the number of current Kansas driver's license holders who obtained their license without a Social Security number, said John Holroyd, a public service administrator with the Department of Motor Vehicles in Wichita.

While some might be foreign students, the majority are believed to be immigrants who renewed licenses they had gotten before Kansas verified residency.

Kansas Secretary of Revenue Joan Wagon said the change could affect 50,000 people in the coming years as their current licenses expire or they seek new licenses.

The number is based on estimates that put the illegal immigrant population in the state at 50,000 to 70,000.

"It's really a significant number if they suddenly can't drive," Wagon said. "I certainly hope that many of them will have resolved their legal status."

The Kansas Department of Revenue estimated at least 160,000 Kansas drivers have no insurance.

The nonprofit Insurance Research Council estimated there is a one-in-seven chance that a driver at fault in an injury accident will be uninsured.

The group estimated the number of uninsured motorists nationwide had risen from 12.7 percent in 1999 to 14.6 percent in 2004, based on claims filed with 11 companies that handle 58 percent of auto insurance policies.

About 13 percent, or 260,000 drivers, were uninsured in Kansas, the study said.

Bob Tomlinson, the state's assistance insurance commissioner, said the actual percentage of uninsured motorists is probably lower than the group estimated. He pegged it at eight to nine percent, or about 160,000 drivers.

A legislative task force is considering an electronic insurance verification system that would allow police to instantly check whether a driver's insurance is valid. The move is designed to deter the common practice by drivers of paying for only one month on their policy and keeping the insurance card for the rest of the year.

Kansas is one of several states considering such a system despite concerns about accuracy and timeliness of the data.

Paula Carter was riding her motorcycle when she was hit by an uninsured driver at an intersection. She said her medical bills were well over $50,000. While her insurance policy covered most of her medical bills, she paid between $2,000 and $3,000 out of her own pocket in addition to the $250 deductible on her motorcycle.

The uninsured driver who hit her was carrying a current insurance card on a policy that had expired.

Carter said she is fortunate to be alive.

"But it is just irritating that these people are out there doing this," she said. "You can buy insurance for 30 days, and then you drive the other 11 months without it."

Instructors named engineering group's advisers of the year

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students in the American Society of Heating, Refrigerating and Air-Conditioning Engineers at K-State now have award-winning advisers.

The group offers engineering students many opportunities to network and learn about the industry, and Jeremy Dreiling, graduate student in architectural engineering and construction science, said he credits the group's success to its two advisers, who were recently named advisers of the year.

Dreiling was the president of the group last year and submitted the recommendation for Julia Keen and Fred Hasler to receive the award.

"I nominated them mainly because of their guidance as advisers," he said.

Keen, assistant professor of architecture engineering and construction science, said the American Society of Heating, Refrigerating and Air-Conditioning Engineers is a professional international society.

She said K-State's chapter has about 60 members composed of both undergraduates and graduates.

Dreiling said both Keen and Hasler were always willing to help the students organize events and were active in creating opportunities to network.

"They were involved just like a student," he said. "It wasn't like an adviser was there just delegating. Our advisers were actually involved with our activities and planning."

Fred Hasler, instructor of architectural engineering and construction science, is the other adviser for the organization.

"Our role is really just as a facilitator," he said. "We help them make their goals happen."

Hasler said the students decide what activities they would like to do and what they would like to learn, and then the advisers find the resources.

He said the members of the organization do several activities throughout the year, including going to conferences, arranging outside speakers to come to campus to talk to them, going to technical presentations and arranging social activities like barbecues.

"We've had a lot of fun doing this," Hasler said.

Hasler said there is an annual kick-off meeting in September, and then later in the semester the members on the executive board present the chapter's goals.

Keen said the organization is open to all majors.

She said the group usually travels to a national meeting in January, and they do community service and other activities throughout the semester.

"The students always have the opportunity to do professional networking, and the national meeting gives them exposure to a professional atmosphere," Keen said.

VARIED MOODS PREVAIL IN 1ST WEEK AS STUDENT CONGLOMERATION RETURNS

By Chuck Powers

THE MEEK and the brash, the intellectual and the dullard, the artist and the business major are back to make the university a university.

And for a mere $122 never-never land opens for another nine months of business with the usual Kansans, New Yorkers and Indians.

TO THE OLD professor on the hill, it's just another large class. Their hair is longer this year, that's all. His eyesight is failing, and he is careful to modulate his voice so it is not wasted on back-row sleepers whom he doesn't bother to wake.

But hope springs eternal, even over formica desk tops and grade cards perforated for the speedy handling of trained machines, and somewhere in the mob there might be a smart one who cares, whose mind races. So his step quickens on the way to class and when it opens he'll be searching again. His voice will be bright until October.

SOMEWHERE in a living group, there is a discussion of Goldwater and athlete's foot raging in the same room. The athlete's foot swallows Goldwater by sheer volume. The topic flips to inevitable generalities about freshman girls.

IN THE DORMITORY a fight almost breaks out in the shower after a freshman pops his new roommate with a wet towel. The victim decides he'd better get things straight right away.

A thin youth looks out his door across the hall and frowns at the disturbance. He shuts the door and paces. He feels alone, thinking maybe he should fight. Before coming to college he read "The Catcher in the Rye." He identifies himself with Holden Caulfield. Later, after he reads Thomas Wolfe, he'll think he's Eugene Gant.

Like death, word sifts down the hall there will be a mixer tonight at a girls' dorm. He hears and opens his door.

He looks in the mirror and wishes his nose slanted a little bit more to the right.

"MIXER" is a strange term for the ritual. Girls talk in groups and wonder if they should allow themselves to be picked up. It doesn't seem proper, somehow. Boys walk around trying to appear bored, their eyes going up and down.

"You're from Colby. You say?" he asks.

"Yes," she says. "It's just northwest of Oakley."

"Oh," he says.

There is a pause. A guy in a Madras sportcoat asks her to dance.

IN BARS, pledges sing and spill beer. In the Union, a youth with a face red from wind that whistled across western Kansas wheat fields holds hands with a high school girlfriend.

Under a tree a boy plays a guitar and a girl sings folk songs with him. The bridge game continues on Union coffee tables. It was going on in May with the same people and the same conversations. It will be going on next May.

EVERY SEPTEMBER is alike. This might be remembered as the year of the folksinger or the year of the quick Cat or the year after the assassination. But it's the same as others.

HALE CAFE | Snack shop opens options for campus caffeine consumption the Union.

The bid process took about two years, said Roberta Johnson, director of financial services and facilities for K-State Libraries.

"The library was responsible for construction and the Union was responsible for other things," Johnson said.

There will not be a sitting area in the cafe, with the intention that it will be a quick-serve venue for students, Johnson said.

Attempts have been made in the past to provide a place for students to buy food and drinks in Hale. Griffin said the Union once supplied the library with a cart for its 24-hour lounge, but it didn't succeed because of its location and inflexibility.

Since then, specific departments and people at K-State, like Lori Goetsch, dean of K-State libraries, have pushed for the extra addition to the library.

Goetsch said she was involved in the planning and opening of a cafe at the University of Maryland. Its success inspired her to follow through with the plans to develop a cafe in Hale, she said.

The traditional policy of no food or drink in Hale might have put a label on the library, Goetsch said.

"Part of doing this has really changed how the library works," she said. "We're out of the food-police business."

About 6,000 people pass through the library each day, Goetsch said. She also said she hopes for more visitors.

"We like the location we picked, even if they're not stopping in the library," she said. "We hope to get some people in our doors that have not yet ventured in here."

The success of the cafe depends upon the students, Johnson said. A clean environment also is still important in Hale. There will be no additional custodial staff in the library, so students will be responsible for picking up trash, Johnson said.

As students entered the library Monday, a few visited the cafe for coffee and snacks.

"It makes it easier when you're going to classes," said Ken Duever, senior in life sciences. "You don't have to walk clear up to the Union."

Natalie Stoss and Von O'Neill help Diann Beuthin, junior in kinesiology, choose a drink from the menu Friday morning. The cafe was open for training Friday and is open for business in Hale Library.

stay home and stay off your feet."

Players had to pass a conditioning test after reporting to camp Aug. 3. The test consisted of running a series of sprints to the 50-yard line.

Six veterans failed on their first attempts, most notably sophomore quarterback Josh Freeman, who eventually passed the test.

Some players still haven't passed, and they were running on the field following Saturday's practice.

"It looks like we've got six left, so hopefully they can get it over," Nelson said. "If they don't, I think they will be running it all season long."

Prince said he's looking for a different team when the Wildcats open the season at Auburn on Sept. 1.

"We've got to get fresh; we've got to get focused," he said. "We need to work very hard. I'm not real happy with the way things are right now, and I don't like our focus."

"She is as physically gifted as any player we've ever had," Fritz said. "I think she is capable of some very, very extraordinary things."

Korobkova will provide extra depth for the Wildcats this season at outside hitter, a position that was thin last year with the loss of junior Rita Liliom to a season-ending knee injury.

The Wildcats open the season Friday at the Shock-er Classic in Wichita.

Theater department prepares for semester's productions

By Patrick Longman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State theater is gearing up for a full semester, and the department is not wasting time getting prepared.

Marci Maullar, managing director for the theater department, said auditions for the first show were Monday and today, and callbacks are Wednesday.

Anna Marietta, senior in theater, said she loves the level of commitment it takes to work on a show, and said one aspect she especially enjoys about theater is the rush to get everything done on time. Marietta does technical theater, working on costume design and other backstage responsibilities.

"My favorite show last year was 'Urinetown,' because I ran the spotlight, so I got to watch the whole thing and still be a part of it," Marietta said.

According to the K-State theater Web site, the K-State students have won many awards for acting, writing plays, design and stage management at the regional Kennedy Center's American College Theatre festival. Several students have won the prestigious Irene Ryan Acting Scholarship.

Additionally, the department is the only program in Kansas accredited by the National Association of Schools of Theatre.

Seating capacity in the three main theaters varies greatly. In McCain, which is designed for large theater and music productions, the auditorium seats 1,800.

Nichols Theatre seats 240, in a less traditional three-sided formation, allowing for greater movement by actors and better views for the audience.

The Purple Masque Theatre is the smallest, seating only 100.

Maullar said the reason the productions show in different venues is to train students.

She also said certain shows are best in different spaces. McCain is best for the operas, she said, but dramas are better in a more intimate space.

Maullar said there is hope for a new performance-arts facility with a theater seating 4,500 people to be built somewhere on campus. Consulting for designs are still in the works.

Compared to other programs at K-State, theater has a relatively small budget.

"The budget for sets, costumes, lights and make-up is $32,000 this year," Maullar said. "What we call the front of house budget - programs, print and radio ads, and royalties - comes to $26,000."

Royalties on some shows can be expensive. For "Fiddler on the Roof," the fee is $5,000, Maullar said.

Maullar said in the 2006-07 season, the musical "Urinetown" and "Much Ado About Nothing" regularly sold out.

"And the only reason 'Tartuffe' didn't sell out was because that was a very busy week," Maullar said.

Tickets for all shows are available at the McCain box office starting Sept. 5. Prices for the plays and dances are $8 for students and $13 for general admission.

Musicals and operas are $10 for students and $15 for general admission.

'Superbad' delivers laughs

"Superbad"

Movie review by Brendan Praeger

Critics lucky enough to attend advance screenings have hailed "Superbad," the R-rated, sex-crazed high-school comedy from director Greg Mottola (The Daytrippers) and producer Judd Apatow (Knocked Up) as "the perfect teen comedy" and "the savior of movie comedy."

While their praise is not completely unjustified, the film is far from perfect. It's about half an hour too long, the weak ending is a bit of a letdown and some of the characters become annoying rather than endearing by the time the credits roll. But despite its downfalls, "Superbad" is still one of the best comedies of the year.

The plot, like most high-school comedies, revolves around a group of sex-starved boys looking for alcohol and women with lowered inhibitions. Seth (Jonah Hill) and Evan (Michael Cera), seniors only a couple weeks from graduation, finally gain access to a popular party by promising to bring booze for everyone.

Jonah Hill's obnoxious character gets old by the film's conclusion. He might be better off sticking to the supporting roles that suit him well. But Michael Cera, fresh from the unfortunately cancelled "Arrested Development," tears through every scene with awkward hilarity.

Newcomer Christopher Mintz-Plasse steals every scene as the wannabe gangster with a fake Hawaiian ID. His fake name, "McLovin," provides more laughs than the entirety of most films.

The script, written by "Knocked Up" star Seth Rogen and Evan Goldberg is more relatable than the average teen comedy. The boys have more on their mind than women.

They're worried whether their friendship will survive after they head off to separate colleges. Even the crazy police officers that kidnap McLovin out for a night on the town dispense genuine romantic advice when they're not shooting at signs and using their sirens to run red lights.

The story might not be original, but it succeeds because of style and sincerity. Rather than a pop-punk soundtrack full of annoying teen angst, the film is full of 1970s funk music. It sounds more like a "Shaft" film than an "American Pie" clone. There is also more quotable dialogue than any other film of late.

"Superbad" might not deserve every bit of hype it has been receiving, but anyone with a slightly perverted sense of humor should walk away satisfied.

Several locations available to drop off recycling

Beer and soda cans litter students' yards, and old clothes fill their closets. Trash overflows from the dumpsters.

With a little effort, students and Manhattan residents can dispose of this clutter, make a little money and maybe even help out the planet.

A variety of Manhattan locations take unwanted items, from bottles to clothing, and some even will pay for them.

One local place to recycle is Howie's Enterprises, which pays for aluminum cans and will take most other materials like glass and plastic.

Another location is Dillons, which will take 5 cents off the total grocery bill for each paper or plastic bag brought in by the customer.

The Dusty Bookshelf will pay for used books.

Also, easily accessible bins are available around campus, and each have a place for empty water bottles,

Judge removes himself from abortion case

By Nicholas Birdsong
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Wichita judge recused himself from proceedings on an abortion case to avoid questions of impartiality on Aug. 18 and another was appointed Aug. 21.

Sedgwick County District Judge Anthony Powell made the decision after political comments Powell made toward the defendant George Tiller in 1998 were made public by the media.

The comments Powell reportedly made accused abortion doctor George Tiller of "defying legal and moral authority" and breaking the law.

Kansas Attorney General Paul Morrison brought Tiller to court for allegedly failing to have an independent second opinion when determining if a fetus was in the third trimester, which violates state law, said John Fliter, legal scholar and professor of political science at K-State.

Tiller's attorneys requested a new judge in the case because of Powell's previous political endeavors.

"Powell was a member of the state legislature when the law was passed that Tiller is currently being prosecuted for," Fliter said.

Judge Clark Owens is stepping in to take over the case for Powell, but questions over judicial bias might not be over.

"Every judge has his own views," said David Magariel, an assistant director of debate at K-State and legal attorney. "Owens was a district attorney before he was a judge and probably formed some pretty strong opinions."

The real concern is not over judicial bias but rather how the public views the case, Magariel said.

"Public opinion shouldn't affect the judicial process, but perhaps it is an overly optimistic view," he said.

College of Vet Med moves to paperless note-taking

By Hannah Blick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The first day of classes for most K-State students typically involves a syllabus handout and scribbled notes.

However, the first day was a little different for first-year students in the College of Veterinary Medicine.

The college is transitioning to a paperless curriculum, which includes integrating the system with the veterinary medicine class of 2011.

The new curriculum will save time, effort and money for the college by eliminating paper notes and textbooks and giving students and professors more class time to discuss in-depth topics, said Melinda Wilkerson, College of Veterinary Medicine associate dean and professor.

"We are feeling very optimistic about the new curriculum and want to see students take advantage of all the perks offered by the new technology," Wilkerson said.

First-year students in veterinary medicine received their personal Toshiba tablet laptops last week, said Wayne Michaels, Computing and Technical Support coordinator for the college. He also said the CaTS team presented one-hour tutorials for the first-year students. The tutorial was designed to instruct students and faculty on the Microsoft Office OneNote software that will be used in the classrooms.

"Microsoft Office OneNote 2007 is a digital notebook that provides a flexible way to gather and organize much more than just your notes," according to Microsoft's Web site. The Web site also explains that OneNote's "powerful search enables you to find information where you couldn't before, such as spoken words in audio and video recordings and text in scanned documents or pictures."

While programs like this are convenient, they are not free.

Students will pay for their laptops in semester installments of $300 during the course of their four-year veterinary medicine education, Wilkerson said.

"This technology fee is included in the students' tuition and replaces their note-service fee," Wilkerson said. "In the long run, it will save them money because it is only slightly more than paying for all of the paper notes we provide for the students."

The tablet laptops are the personal property of the student possessing them and theirs to keep even when they graduate, Michaels said. He also said the laptops are equipped with a four-year warranty through Toshiba to protect students in case of an accident.

The CaTS team also is ready to handle any glitches that might arise in the first few uncertain weeks of classes and already has installed each laptop with virus protection, Michaels said.

"We know we've probably made a few mistakes, but we're being very open with students and feel that we're prepared to handle any problems

Bald eagle removed from Endangered Species List, still protected by wildlife services

By Cassandre Braden
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For 30 years the iconic symbol of America has been struggling for a stronghold in the animal world. However, finally, because of its recent rise in population, the bald eagle was removed from the Endangered Species List.

In a July 9 Federal Register issued by the Department of the Interior, the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service announced they are removing the bald eagle from the list due to the increased number of birds.

The population decrease was a result of the widespread use of a pesticide called Dichloro-Diphenyl-Trichloroethane, more commonly known as DDT.

The chemical compound was outlawed after the discovery that it weakened the eggs of the birds of prey; however, the loss of birds during this time was so substantial that it took the bald eagles three decades of federal protection to rebuild their numbers, said Allie Lousch, marketing development officer for Sunset Zoological Park.

Two of these creatures live at Sunset Zoo. Their names are Abe and Alaska, Lousch said, and the zoo has housed them for approximately five years.

She said it is illegal for zoological parks or private citizens to possess bald eagles unless they are obtained for rehabilitation services or born into captivity.

"These animals would not have survived in the wild. They still cannot fly, though they do hop around a lot," Lousch said.

The bald eagles at the zoo are given annual physicals to keep them in the best health. The birds undergo blood work, are checked for parasites and have their talons trimmed, said Lisa Greening, animal keeper at the zoo. She also said their care will remain the same, even after being removed from the list.

According to the Fish and Wildlife Service, the eagles still will be protected because of their recently gained status. It will remain illegal to obtain or possess the bird or any of its feathers, talons or beak.

Employees at the zoo were particularly excited about the withdrawal of the bald eagle from the list, Lousch said, because one of their main goals is to promote the conservation of animals and flora.

"We hope this will bring people to the zoo to see other animals that need protection," she said.

"We want people to make connections at the zoo to a world that is bigger than 'Man-happiness' and Kansas."

ESTATE GOES ON SALE FOR RECORD PRICE

DEL MAR, Calif. — With stocks foundering and the real-estate world reeling, here's a counterpoint: The owners of 5.7 acres of prime oceanfront real estate have put an estate on the market for a record $76 million, three times what they paid seven years ago.

But don't think about moving into a palatial home. The main house on the grounds is not fit for occupancy.

The 1937 Colonial-style mansion with 10,000 square feet, nine bedrooms, 7.5 bathrooms, leaded glass, chandeliers, a sweeping staircase and inlaid floors installed by Swedish craftsmen has been gutted. Also on the site is a guest house.

The owners, local venture capitalist Bill Stensrud and his wife, Carol, are out of the country and not available for comment, and their real-estate agent, Brian Gultinan, can offer only limited details of what is a highly secretive offering.

What's known about the listing is that it carries the highest price ever asked for a local home-site.

But it's the land, not the house, that's being marketed. Before altering the site, a buyer must deal with Del Mar's strict land-use regulations.

Given the legions of super-rich individuals who want a pad in paradise, the present state of the housing and stock markets might be irrelevant to their decision to buy a coastal property.

"We just did a deal for $48 million on the sand (in Del Mar) — it closed two months ago," Gultinan said. "We sold another for $6.5 million in Rancho Santa Fe and another for $15 (million) to $16 million. There's a lot of big deals out there."

BOSTON — Boston Rob Mariano has many talents — namely, the ability to extend his fame by starring on numerous reality shows.

Most recently, he was at Faneuil Hall to judge auditions for the new reality show he's hosting, "Tontine." The "Tontine" auditions were mellow, but the auditions in San Diego turned into a full-on melee.

Boston Rob and a heckler start jawing and slapping at each other a little. A tall, skinny staffer attempts to wedge himself between the two, and then the heckler must have touched a nerve because Boston Rob plows his fist at him — twice, and sharply. His fighting skill led the person who sent us the video to call him the "Robfather."

So, message to anyone who makes it to the next round of "Tontine"? Don't backtalk the host. Then again, the producers might prefer it if you did. Reality-show fans like nothing more than a good rumble.

TOP PARTY SCHOOL: WEST VIRGINIA

MORGANTOWN, W.Va. — To the disappointment of school administrators — and the pride of some students — West Virginia University is No. 1 on The Princeton Review's annual list of the top party schools.

The school has made the list seven times in the past 15 years, despite efforts to curb underage drinking and rowdy behavior.

But not since 1997 have the Mountaineers taken the top spot. Last year, WVU was No. 3, bested by the University of Texas at Austin and Penn State, both of which remain in the top 10 this year.

Senior Katie O'Hara, 22, said WVU is No. 1 because "no matter what kind of party you want, it's here — bars, fraternities, house parties. ... If you want to take shots all night, there's a bar. No matter what you want to do, it's there."

Still, O'Hara said her friends "know how to manage their time. They know when to party and when not to," which wouldn't explain the school's No. 1 ranking in the category of Their Students (Almost) Never Study.

The rankings are contained in the 2008 edition of "The Best 366 Colleges," which is going on sale today and is based on a survey of 120,000 students at those schools.

Incoming WVU President Mike Garrison focused on the positive rather than the rankings, saying the students he met over the weekend and on the first day of classes Monday are more concerned with their futures "and with the great year we have ahead" than with partying.

Brigham Young University claimed the top spot in the "Stone Cold Sober" category for the 10th straight year.

CLUB SELLING 'SOPRANOS' ITEMS

LODI, N.J. — Now that "The Sopranos" is over, the owners of the real-life club that played the part of the Bada Bing will auction off the 12-foot stripper poles and other relics from the HBO drama on eBay.

Other items sale later this week include a pool table, a disco ball and the fluorescent purple men's room sign often seen in the background as mob boss Tony Soprano conducted business.

Susie Quigley, who runs special events at Satin Dolls (which passed for the Bada Bing), wouldn't speculate on how much the poles might fetch.

"The poles have been featured in almost every single episode. I can't begin to say," said Quigley, a former dancer who appeared as an extra last season.

Also up for sale: at least 10 standard-issue bar stools that James Gandolfini, who played Tony Soprano, and his crew sat on.

CDs turn 25; debate over future of music devices begins

By Megan Molitor
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After the years of vinyl records and cassette tapes, many students grew up singing along to compact discs.

The music device known and loved throughout the world is celebrating its 25th anniversary this year, according to CNN.com. However, as many celebrate the longevity of this technology, many others are worried the CD is becoming obsolete.

With the invention of devices such as MP3 players, some believe the CD is on its way out.

Brian Lauer, junior in agricultural technology management, said he uses CDs frequently, but only to burn music.

"CDs have been outdated for a while now, beginning with the invention of satellite radio and MP3 players," Lauer said.

"Even though I don't use either one right now, I can see them taking over totally in the near future."

Others believe CDs still hold value for some individuals but not necessarily everyone.

Eric Dover, client support team leader at the Information Technology Assistance Center, said he believes CDs are becoming outdated from a consumer perspective.

"From an archivist perspective, CDs still have a decent format," Dover said. "If you look at what is replacing CDs, such as iTunes, Napster and other various legal ways to download music, you still have to have the software, and the quality of the music is reduced somewhat through the digitization process."

Dover said CDs still serve a purpose for creating strong audio files, and many people still will gravitate toward them for their improved tunnel range.

"If you listen to a track on a CD, it may sound clearer and richer versus what you hear on a digital audio file," he said, explaining tunnel range.

However, the process of turning to new music technology is not a new thing. Dover said he began to see it a few years ago, when he was a college student.

"In the late '90s, we began to see digital audio files have an impact on CDs," he said. "Students began downloading music as opposed to buying it."

"iTunes has surpassed many major vendors on selling music. It is currently in the top five, if not the top four, for music distribution. iTunes is the first digital music store to have this kind of sales."

Others choose to remain optimistic about the future of the compact disc.

Sarah Cunnick, who has co-owned Sisters of Sound Music in Aggieville since 2004, said the first CDs were created in England in the 1970s, and consisted of only classical music.

Cunnick, whose store carries all major genres of music, also said she thinks there are different groups of music listeners.

"You have the young, savvy crowd that is into the electronic age and are not very into buying CDs," she said. "Then you have the older crowd who still listens to them."

"Also, there is an age range of about 15-35 that are just now discovering vinyl records, which is a whole other place to get music."

She said she is not worried about CDs becoming an outdated technology because producers and record labels are adding more to their CDs.

"They're making dual discs and having special features that allow you to use the CD in your computer to open up Web sites and other different programs," Cunnick said.

"Some newer artists are now starting to put their music on records as well. All the different forms of music are beginning to work together."

Cunnick said she believes that these new formats will always be strong, but she said music listeners always should remember the former music media.

"They're messing around with all the formats, and we're going somewhere with it that we have never been before," she said. "Always be searching for different forms of music, and don't be limited."

"Music is something that brings us all together and is a divine gift of language."

The Jardine Redevelopment Project is under way as students have moved into the first 10 buildings completed.

Mark Nelson, senior in philosophy, and Ronnie Hernandez, freshman in sociology, talked about the perks of living in the new Jardine Apartments.

"It's a great location," Nelson said. "It's close to campus; it's right by the football stadium. What more could you want?"

Hernandez said he likes the keyless entry technology at Jardine.

"We don't have keys for the doors here," Hernandez said.

"Instead, we have a card that slides through a slot in the door, and then we have to punch in our four-digit code to open the door. You get to pick your own code."

Both Nelson and Hernandez once lived in the residence halls and said they liked apartment living better.

"Unlike at the dorms where you have to put in quarters just to do your own laundry, we have our own washer and dryer hook-ups here," Hernandez said.

He said there is central heating and air conditioning in each apartment, and bedrooms have their own private bathrooms.

"What I like about it here is that the rent is cheap," Nelson said. "Here, you don't really pay that much, considering what all you get."

Hernandez said he was one of the first residents to move into Building 9 in the complex. He said he filled out an application to live there after a semester of living in Moore Hall.

"I was kind of shocked at first when they picked me as one of the first residents here," Hernandez said.

"I was honored, you know? This is like a once-in-a-lifetime experience. It's a part of history."

There are three Jardine neighborhoods: the Plaza, Denison and West End.

Cathy Van Steenis, area coordinator for the Plaza neighborhood, said 10 new unfurnished apartment buildings have been built at Jardine and four furnished are on the way.

"The new buildings have completion dates anywhere from Sept. 1 of this year to February of next year," Van Steenis said.

Van Steenis said the two phases of apartment construction at Jardine are dubbed phase one and phase two. During phase one, critical questions are asked relating to the students' and the market's needs. Phase two occurs when the apartments are near completion.

"Three of the new planned buildings are still in phase one," she said. "A fourth building is near completion."

Van Steenis said the entire redevelopment project is being financed by bonds and private contributions.

"No student dollars are being utilized for this," she said.

Guan Lan, graduate student in grain science, moved from the traditional to the remodeled Jardine apartments.

"I heard the new ones in Building 9 are really, really nice," Lan said. "I really wish I could live there."

"There's not much difference between the old and renovated ones. It's the same amount of space. The only major difference is that there is carpet in the renovated ones," she said.

Lan said two advantages of living in the renovated apartments is the electric power instead of gas and an air conditioner in the unit.

"The old ones didn't have A/C in them already. You had to go out and buy and install your own A/C," Lan said.

"But the renovated units came with A/C units already in them, which is nice."

Lan added that she thinks both the old and renovated apartments should be redeveloped entirely.

CES sponsors 4th-annual barbecue

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State students' future careers might start with a free hot dog and Pepsi today at Career and Employment Services' fourth-annual Welcome Back Barbecue.

Dottie Evans, CES assistant director, said the barbecue's purpose is to inform students of career services available to them.

"It's our first opportunity to tell students, 'Hey, come be a part of us,'" Evans said. "We bring students in to have lunch with us, but it also gives them a chance to meet the assistant directors for each of the colleges."

The CES assistant directors' role is to work with students as they develop their résumés and begin their career searches, Evans said. CES conducts college-specific workshops and university-wide events throughout the semester, she said.

The center also helps students look for part-time jobs on campus and in the community, Evans said.

About 1,800 hot dogs are available for students during the barbecue, Evans said. ALDI is sponsoring the barbecue.

"What's been interesting over the last four years is that we get rid of the hot dogs earlier and earlier, so that's our measure that students are interested, and we're getting the word out there," Evans said.

For the second year, KACZ-FM 96.3 also will have a live broadcast at the barbecue, Evans said.

"It seemed to add more of a party atmosphere last year, so we thought we'd do it again," she said.

The first 175 students who activate a CES account will receive a free T-shirt. An account allows students direct communication on CES events, and students

In the first two days of classes, more than 2,300 K-State students already activated an account with CES, which is the same number of students who had registered mid-year in 2006-07, Evans said.

Evans said she encourages students to get involved with CES early in their academic careers so they can polish their résumés and interviewing skills.

"It's never too soon to start developing your résumé and learning to market your skills," she said. "While graduation might seem far away, it comes up soon."

Letitia Tajuba, senior in political science, said she has worked as a student paraprofessional with CES for two years.

Tajuba said she encourages students to attend the barbecue to learn about the semester and year-long activities, including the part-time opportunities fair Thursday.

Tajuba also said CES helped her develop a more marketable résumé and professional interviewing skills.

"CES always asks students what it is they want and what they want to see happen," Tajuba said. "They actually really care about what they're doing and they want to be there."

TO THE POINT

K-State's future is paperless

The College of Veterinary Medicine has made an intelligent choice for the future in making its first-year curriculum completely paperless.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Starting with the class of 2011, the college is integrating personal Toshiba tablet laptops in hopes of saving time and effort in the classroom. Paper note-taking and textbooks are now absent from the first-year students' classrooms and laboratories. The students have enough on their minds with 18-hour class schedules; they no longer have the hassle of juggling notebooks and textbooks around.

While university officials have yet to experience any glitches with the new laptops, the Computing and Technical Support (CaTS) team is prepared. An extra technician was hired solely to handle issues with the new laptops and their software.

The college also is slowly introducing the curriculum and laptops with just its first-year students. This slow integration allows for the university and students to adjust to the technology changes and problems as they come along.

The university also is saving its Veterinary Medicine students money, which is appreciable for anyone pursuing a doctorate at one of the country's oldest Veterinary Medicine colleges.

The College of Veterinary Medicine is the first college at K-State to make the transition into paperless. However, with a slow introduction of the curriculum one class at a time, it is likely other academic colleges and departments at K-State will soon follow.

No way out

Binging leads to disastrous behavior

One of the most prevalent activities on any campus is drinking. For some, consuming alcohol or "binging" is a new-found freedom away from anyone to tell them no. Others have been seasoned drinkers throughout high school waiting for this time of their lives.

College is not the time to drink until blacking out, missing class and feeling horrible. It's supposed to be the time of your life — meeting new people and receiving an education to become positive members of the community. Alcoholics and binge drinkers are not generally productive members of society.

Because of the number of college students who drink, there is a high correlation between college and alcohol dependency, or binge drinking.

According to Harvard School of Public Health, six percent of college students meet the criteria for alcoholism, and 31 percent could be considered alcohol dependent.

Students should be aware of the danger they are putting themselves in when they go to their next party. It is also wise to know when it's time to stop drinking before students plummet out of control.

Alcohol dependency, according to Merriam-Webster dictionary, is "continued excessive or compulsive use of alcoholic drinks." Continued throughout life, it could become a chronic addiction, eventually taking control over one's life.

Because of this, the last thing any successful college student needs is to be drinking excessively. Most freshmen start drinking because they can. Freshmen, like myself, should not start the cycle.

Alcohol abuse can affect reasonable thinking, ability to make positive decisions and loss of defenses in cases of rape and sexual assault.

According to the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse, 97,000 students between the ages of 18 and 24 are victims of alcohol-related sexual assault or date rape.

Also, approximately 1,700 college students die from unintentional alcohol-related injuries.

Who wants to increase the risks of being assaulted? Not me.

Many students start to drink because of peer pressure, while others will start because of psychological reasons, like depression.

The National Mental Health Association states one-third of those who are depressed will suffer from some sort of substance abuse or dependence. According to the same study, 60 percent of students show signs of depression.

According to these statistics, about 20 percent of students are susceptible to alcohol abuse.

Drinking does not take your problems away.

It makes you feel great for the night, and then the next morning you are hung over, and your problems are still there.

Binge drinking on a regular basis has the potential of leading to alcoholism. The Journal on Studies of Alcohol defines binge drinking as consuming more than five drinks in a row for men or four for women.

Binging kills brain cells. You do not remember what happens and irresponsible behavior happens much more frequently around binge drinking.

We all have seen people having way too much to drink without being able to stop until they are oblivious to the world around them. Binging leads to lack of responsibility like not showing up for class or work and participating in harmful or risky behaviors. With all sorts of pressure on students, most cannot afford to slack.

The best way to reduce the risk of becoming a statistic is to not start drinking at all. However, that method is about as effective as teaching abstinence in high school.

In a world full of risks, desires and pressures to be accepted by the crowd, the best decision is to be smart.

Do not let liquor get ahead of your tolerance. Stop chugging and know when it's time to set it down.

Interview with Satan alludes to past, future political campaigns

The following is an interview with Satan conducted this past summer.

Chuck: It's great to finally meet up with you. You're a very hard man to track down.

Satan: Well, you need to look in the right place ... or the wrong one, if you will.

C: Indeed. Before we get started, what would you like me to call you?

Mr. Lucifer? Beelzebub? Prince of Darkness?

S: Oh, you can just call me Floyd. I'm a pretty normal guy — you've probably seen me around.

C: Sounds good, Floyd. Let's get straight to the important stuff. How do you think the presidential race is going so far?

F: (Groan). To be honest, it's not that exciting since I know the outcome. How about I tell you who will win the primaries? The Republican Party is going to support Rudy Giuliani. Nothing too surprising. You really think I'd let a Mormon win? People might rather have me running the country! As far as the Democratic Party goes, it was basically up to me to decide which soul was the most desirable. Hillary Clinton was my first pick, but after further review, I realized she is actually too evil for the presidency. So, I went with John Edwards. His continued talk about the poor makes me so happy. What kind of guy could talk about helping the poor and then spend $1,200 on a haircut? That's like David Vitter talking about ethics and then showing up on the phone lists of the D.C. Madam — which was one of my prouder moments. Oh, and I love how he has his wife fight his battles for him. It's so cute watching her stick up for her husband. I get confused as to which one is the man in the relationship. Those two are like family to me.

C: Let's talk about Clinton a little. Has she ever been involved with you before?

F: There have been times when I think she's my boss. Have you seen her in debates? She makes me blush. In 2002, she supported the war. In 2003, she wanted to stay involved in Iraq. In 2004, she admitted Hussein was a problem. In 2005, she didn't want to set a withdrawal date, and now she's running on a campaign of ending this war, even to the extent of not funding your soldiers. You can't learn that kind of evilness in the classroom. Oh, and her obsession with socialized health care is just phenomenal. Karl Marx and I have talked about her over dinner numerous times, and to put it bluntly, he's jealous of Bill.

C: Speaking of Bill, has he ever been in cahoots with you?

F: Let's just say Bill and I go way back. You remember those Puerto Rican terrorists' sentences that he commuted in 1999? A person with a conscience couldn't do that; it was all me. And the whole Lewinsky scandal? You really think a guy like him could get action in the Oval Office without my assistance? And don't even get me started on the Middle East. If Bill wanted to, he could've captured Osama bin Laden two or three times. But, he left that mess for the next president, which made me and my partners quite happy. While I like to take the credit, I must share some with him for the attacks on Sept. 11.

C: So you've basically had your hand in every presidency?

F: Remember those dead people who voted in 1960? Well, they actually did vote! I set up special booths on the second and third levels of Hell just for that election. And the recount in 2000, I —

C: You mean Gore actually won?

F: (Laughter.) Well, I tried my hardest to help Gore, but even I couldn't fix that election. He had no chance in hell. And if he thinks it's hot on Earth, wait until he dies. And with that, I need to get running. If you ever need anything, anything at all, just let me know.

C: Where can I find you?

F: Oh, I'll be around.

Kansas representative addresses issues concerning college students

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nancy Boyda spoke Monday to a small group of Manhattan citizens in the Riley County Senior Services Center about the issues they wanted to address like the war in Iraq and health care.

The town-hall style meeting, which was set up to gain a perspective on constituents' issues, was one of many visits by Boyda, representative of the 2nd district.

The Collegian was granted a one-on-one interview to talk more specifically about the issues many college students may face.

Q: What are you doing on Capitol Hill to help out students with the ever-rising tuition costs?

A: We've done a lot. The school loans — we've taken the interest rate from 6.4 to 3.2 — cut it in half.

The previous Congress had just let it keep inching up. We've made some modest increases in Pell Grants, and we've also increased the accessibility of a few. We've made it easier to qualify, and again, these are going to make some differences. When you're in a hole, the first thing you do is stop digging. So the hole was getting deeper and deeper, interest rates were going up, the amounts stayed the same, and it was getting harder and harder to qualify. So we really decreased the interest. We just stopped digging the Pell Grant hole, and we started to turn things around and make it easier to access. It's a modest increase. I'm not going to sit here and say otherwise. On any given day it will not keep up with the increase of tuition, which is extremely rapid.

Q: Are you personally planning anything to help out students here specifically?

A: What I'm going to be doing is to push them through Senate and to vote on them when they come out of the committee. Just because they have passed these bills doesn't mean they will become law. Right now, my belief is that this fall the minority side of the aisle is going to do everything they can to make sure we don't pass any of these bills. And if the students want to see these passed, then quite honestly they need to participate in their democracy like everyone else and stand up and tell all six members of Congress from Kansas and let them know it is unacceptable to not pass these bills.

Q: A significant amount of your support is from college-aged students. How important is it to visit communities like Lawrence and Manhattan?

A: It's extremely important. The good news is that college-aged students are starting to get it. They're starting to see that the policies that go on in Washington really affect their daily lives and their futures. They are asking many, many more questions about policies. So it's important to recognize them not only because you represent a vote but because you really are our future. You are the ones that are going to shape policy.

Q: Many students get their news from shows like the "Colbert Report" on Comedy Central. Would you be afraid to go on a show like that?

A: I wouldn't necessarily be afraid, but what they do, and you know what they do, is tape about a half hour and pull snippets out. And quite honestly, I get enough of that with people reporting what I say and taking it out of context. They say it's fun, and they said everyone that went on there got re-elected, including the guy who said he used heroin. Now in Kansas that would not be taken so kindly. It's a humor that I'm going to let other people be the brunt end of those jokes.

Q: Is there any hope for college students here in Manhattan?

A: I think there's an amazing amount of hope. I've been in Manhattan (on Monday). The businesses springing up around Manhattan are just amazing. So you are getting a good education here but there are many, many opportunities to stay here and work here in Manhattan and raise your families in Kansas. So I am extremely hopeful about that. The hope has to be backed up by participating in this democracy. Democracy is a contact sport, and if you want the policies that you think are important not only for you but the entire country, you need to make sure you remain involved. In Kansas that means your representative and your two senators.

Slogans too cliché to inspire

Team slogans and cool catchphrases are a part of sports that I've never completely understood. Whether it was on high school basketball teams or the professional teams I followed, I've never bought the belief that the slogans actually have any effect on a team's unity or ability to perform.

NICK DUNN

Maybe I'm wrong. That's certainly very possible.

Take, for example, the hip Spanish phrases used by old Kansas City Royals manager Tony Peña, who used his "Nosotros Creemos" ("We Believe") slogan in 2003 to spark the Royals to a rare winning season. Was it the slogan that made such a big difference? It's hard to tell, but I hope not. You'd like to think pro players don't need some crazy manager uttering nonsense to get them to believe they can actually win. But maybe they did.

The next year, Peña's "Juntos Podemos" ("Together We Can") slogan didn't quite produce the same results. With the season a complete trainwreck by the end of the first month, "Together We Can" quickly became a perfect punch line for anyone looking to make fun of the Royals. All you had to do was fill in the rest of the thought — together we can ... be ridiculously awful, or together we can ... lose more than 100 games, which is exactly what they did. I have good reason to believe a few Royals players probably hated that Spanish silliness, which means it had the opposite result Peña was hoping for. Instead of building team unity, it caused tension.

All of this, of course, brings us to K-State coach Ron Prince's "The Power of One" slogan he coined for the 2007 football season. It's a rather peculiar — maybe even ironic — choice. Think about it. A group of more than 100 players and coaches joining together under "The Power of One."

Critics of the theme have said it's an obvious reference to quarterback Josh Freeman, who wears the No. 1 on his jersey. On the media guide, "The Power of One" is written across the middle of the cover, with Freeman's No. 1 jersey hanging up directly to the right of the text. It would be like Missouri having a "Chasing the Dream" theme in reference to quarterback Chase Daniel, critics said. While the circumstances are highly coincidental, I'm not buying it.

Actually, according to Prince, the idea for the slogan came from a book called "The Power of One." The book, written in 1989 by Bryce Courtenay, is the self-proclaimed classic novel of South Africa. How a book written in 1989 can be a classic is beyond me.

Anyway, it's taken from the first-person perspective of a 6-year-old English boy named Peekay living in South Africa during World War II. It follows Peekay's journey from childhood misfit to boxing champion. It's a story of personal development, never giving up on yourself no matter how tough life becomes, and never losing the power of one, which is defined on page 103 as, "one idea, one heart, one mind, one plan, one determination."

It is not, as far as I can tell, a story of a group of people

Fast track to fitness

Students work out on the exercise bikes and the two indoor tracks at the Peters Recreation Complex.

Rec offers new options, classes

Does the term freshman 15 mean anything to you?

Maybe it did a few years ago, and now you're more worried about the senior 40. Either way, stop trembling at the thought and get over to the Peters Recreation Complex.

Before lacing up your Nikes and coordinating workout tops with your new roommate, here's a heads-up on some changes to expect.

First, before you begin your adventure to the edge of campus, make sure you have your student ID. As flattering or unflattering as it might be, your ID is now required for entrance.

"We are not looking up people's names anymore," said Brecken Jones, building supervisor at the rec. Consider yourself warned.

Another change that will affect students is the repackaging of personal training services. The most notable change pertains to body-fat testing. Last year, after the purchase of a fancy bioelectric impedance scale, body composition testing was available for $10.

"This year, you cannot just pay for body fat testing — now you have to purchase an entire fitness assessment," said Erin Dawson, newly hired assistant director at the rec. A fitness assessment costs $15, and includes tests for strength, muscle endurance, cardiovascular condition, flexibility, blood pressure and body composition.

Traditionally, body composition testing consists of a seven-site skin-fold test in addition to the bioelectric impedance scale, but circumference measurements also can be taken.

Group fitness classes are also undergoing some changes. Some classes have different names — for example, the Expedition indoor cycling class is now called Scenic Spin. So before you freak out because your favorite class isn't on the schedule, check out the class descriptions.

New classes also have been added. In addition to the ever-popular Butz n Gutz, an Armz n Abz class is available for the tight-bunned exercise-class goers.

For participants wanting a new interval-type workout, the rec added a new 3-2-1 class. This class is based on interval workouts used by celebrity trainers, and it consists of three minutes of cardio, two minutes of strength training, and one minute of core work.

So grab your ID cards and come join the craziness that is the rec at the start of the school year. Take a class, hire a personal trainer or just scope out some sweaty members of the opposite sex. There really is no place on campus like the rec.

Remember to follow old weight-room rules

1. Proper athletic attire must be worn.

Parading around in a sports bra does not count as proper attire. You must do your parading with your midriff completely covered.

Also, the rec does not allow flip-flops, slippers or bare feet in the weight room. Even if you remembered your ID, you can't lift without closed-toe shoes.

2. If you don't know how to use some equipment, ask for assistance.

As amusing as it might be to watch that sports-bra-clad freshman try to use the Rotary Torso machine sitting backwards, injuries can occur. Please ask the weight room attendant for help. They're trained for that kind of thing.

3. Do not drop your weights. Re-rack your weights and use the collars.

Yeah, so Ah-Nold might throw his weights to the ground with great enthusiasm in his video, but you are not Arnold Schwarzenegger.

And if you were trying to get that cute weight room attendant's attention, you got it all right. She now thinks you are a gorilla, and she's going to yell at you or kick you out, depending on how cute you are.

A great way to become the gym jerk is to leave your dumbbells and weight plates laying around. This means leaving that 45-pound plate on the bench press just to show off. Attendants will ask repeat offenders to leave.

Speaking of bench press, use the collars on all free-weight lifts. Your lifting buddies won't be your buddies anymore when you break someone's foot.

Intramural sports offer release from semester stressors

By Andy Nelson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The summer has come to a screeching halt, and professors have already loaded down students with enough homework to make their brains explode.

If students are looking for something to take the edge off this semester, the Peters Recreation Complex is offering several solutions.

Intramural sports are getting ready to kick off for the fall semester.

The rec is taking entries for a variety of activities, including flag football, soccer, 3-wall handball singles, 3-wall racquetball singles, horseshoe singles, tennis singles, badminton singles, doubles volleyball, 1-on-1 basketball, and also a punt, pass and kick event.

All intramural singles activities are open to men and women, and the team sports feature men's, women's and co-ed leagues.

John Wondra, assistant director at the rec, urged students to submit intramural entries as soon as possible.

"The first thing people need to do is to organize their teams and get their team entries turned in," Wondra said. "The entry deadline for flag football, soccer, and the first fall session of individual dual sports is Friday at 5."

The entry fee is $20 for major team sports and $1 for individual sports.

The rec also is hiring flag football officials, Wondra said. Interested parties must attend three training sessions, with the first scheduled for 5 p.m. Thursday at the rec. Officials earn $7.50 per hour.

So if engaging in a bit of friendly competition sounds like it can relieve some of the stress of the semester, students should head to the rec to submit entries for one of the many intramural sports available at the rec complex.

Johnson agrees to contract with Chiefs

Holdout running back Larry Johnson agreed to a six-year contract extension and joined the Kansas City Chiefs for practice Tuesday, surprising teammates who broke into scattered cheers when he jogged unannounced onto the field.

"Lar-ry! Lar-ry," many players chanted. They had already been practicing for about 45 minutes when No. 27 suddenly appeared in their midst and began running plays.

Johnson, 27, set the NFL record with 416 carries last year while rushing for 1,789 yards, snapping the team record he set the year before. His six-year deal includes a $19 million guarantee.

After practice, Johnson quickly dressed and left without speaking with reporters.

Anderson signs financial-aid agreement, joins 2007 recruits

High-school forward Ron Anderson has signed a financial aid agreement at K-State, coach Frank Martin announced Tuesday.

Anderson, a 6-foot-8, 245-pound post player, joins K-State's 2007 recruiting class, already regarded as one of the nation's best.

"We are excited about the addition of Ron to our basketball program," Martin said in a statement. "He will provide us with an option to score the ball from the low post."

"In addition, he has a very good understanding of how to play the game with his back to the basket. He is a very young player but very mature for his age and will be an excellent addition to an already stellar recruiting class."

Anderson comes to K-State after playing at the Mc-

Callie School in Chattanooga, Tenn., where he averaged 15.1 points, 11.6 rebounds and 2.8 blocks in 22 games for the East Region champions.

Anderson is the son of retired NBA player Ron Anderson Sr.

With the addition of Anderson, K-State now has the NCAA-maximum 13 scholarships.

— KSU Sports Information

Samuels misses cut

Martin also announced incoming freshman recruit Jamar Samuels did not meet academic requirements and will not join K-State at this time.

Samuels is a 6-foot-8 forward from the Patterson School in Lenoir, N.C., the same school that produced K-State freshman Dominique Sutton. He played AAU basketball for the D.C. Assault.

BANGLADESH GOVERNMENT ORDERS
ARMY OFF CAMPUS

DHAKA, Bangladesh — The Bangladesh government ordered soldiers to leave a university campus Tuesday, after two days of clashes between student protesters and police left more than 150 injured, officials and news reports said.

Police were among about 100 people hurt in Monday's clashes at Dhaka University campus, local media reported.

The protests in defiance of emergency rules were triggered by a dispute between students and soldiers earlier Monday during a soccer match on the campus in Dhaka, Bangladesh's capital, said university official A.F.M. Haider.

Clashes resumed Tuesday when police tried to break up more than 500 students demanding the army withdraw from the campus, said university teacher Golam Rahman.

The unrest spread to other nearby campuses, where students boycotted classes and took to the streets shouting anti-government slogans, halting traffic and damaging dozens of vehicles.

BUSH SAYS U.S. READY TO HELP VICTIMS OF HURRICANE DEAN

MONTEBELLO, Quebec — President Bush, at a North American summit on Tuesday, offered U.S. assistance and expressed his concern for the citizens of Mexico and elsewhere whose lives were affected by Hurricane Dean.

"We stand ready to help," said Bush, standing alongside Mexican President Felipe Calderon and Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper. "The American people care a lot about the human condition in our neighborhood, and when we see human suffering, we want to do what we can."

UGANDAN PROTESTERS DEMAND JOURNALIST'S DEPORTATION

KAMPALA, Uganda — Hundreds of people held an anti-gay protest in Uganda's capital Tuesday, denouncing what they called an immoral lifestyle and demanding the deportation of an American journalist writing about gay rights in the deeply conservative country.

Homosexuality is illegal in Uganda, like in most African states, and carries a maximum sentence of life imprisonment. Tuesday's demonstration was the latest in a series of showdowns between religious conservatives and a small, but growing, gay rights movement across the continent.

The protesters gathered at a Kampala sports ground holding banners with anti-gay messages and posters demanding the deportation of 22-year-old Katherine Roubos.

INDIAN ARMY RECOVERS
FROZEN BODIES OF 3
SOLDIERS IN HIMALAYAS

GAUHATI, India — The soldier, barely 20 years old, was killed in a plane crash high in the northern Himalayas nearly 40 years ago.

His snow-preserved body was finally brought home Tuesday, draped in the Indian flag and covered with fresh marigolds.

Mahendra Nath Phukon died when an air force transport carrying him and his Indian army colleagues crashed into the 20,500-foot Chandrabhaga peak in Himachal Pradesh state in 1968. All 102 soldiers aboard were killed.

An army search team found the frozen bodies of Phukon and two other soldiers were found by an army search team at an altitude of more than 17,500 feet earlier this month.

PUTIN OPENS RUSSIAN AIR SHOW WITH CALL FOR VIGOROUS PRODUCTION

ZHUKOVSKY, Russia — Russia opened its largest air show in post-Soviet history Tuesday, showing off its growing military footprint and global assertiveness as it tries to boost sagging aircraft development and production.

President Vladimir Putin, who last week announced that his country's long-range bombers had resumed patrols over the world's oceans, stressed Russia's prominence in production of military aircraft but said it must be more competitive in creating passenger planes.

The Kremlin is determined to revive the heyday of Soviet aviation, and the government has invested in a new S-400 missile defense system and enhanced its MiG and Sukhoi fighter jets.

IRANIAN-AMERICAN ACADEMIC HELD IN TEHRAN ON BAIL

TEHRAN, Iran — A detained Iranian-American academic accused of conspiring against the government will be freed from prison within hours if her bail is posted, a top judiciary official said Tuesday.

Haleh Esfandiari, director of the Middle East program at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars, has been jailed largely incommunicado at Tehran's Evin prison since May on charges of acting against national security.

Bail was set at 3 billion rials or about $333,000, Mohammad Shadabi, an official at the Tehran prosecutor's office, told The Associated Press. "I can't say for now that she will be allowed to leave the country or not," Shadabi added.

City commissioners vote to grant funds to emergency shelter

By Nicholas Birdsong
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Commissioners agreed in a 5-0 vote to grant a zero-interest loan to the Manhattan Emergency Shelter Inc. during the city commission meeting Tuesday evening for the purposes of building a new facility.

The city issued the loan in the amount of $260,000, which it will pay to the shelter management over the course of four years.

Officials at the shelter will use the grant to supplement the money they have already raised.

The shelter found it necessary to request the funds from the commission because initial estimates were short of the actual cost of the facility, city officials said.

The city commission also approved the $1,240,149 construction bid from Ron Fowles Construction Management Services Inc. by a 5-0 vote.

Fowles Construction expects to begin construction within 60 days of the approval, city manager Ron Fehr said.

Some concerns were raised by commissioners about the project. Economic impact of the shelter was the initial problem the commission had with granting the funds.

"Increases in the size of the facility will just cause higher operating costs," said Commissioner Mark Hatesohl.

Emergency shelter management responded to the concern during the meeting.

"The new facility was designed with efficiency in mind," said Mandy Chapman-Semple, executive director of the shelter. "We will be able to serve double the amount of people at about the same cost."

Hatesohl also expressed concern over the possibility of other social-service groups requesting funds from the city if the officials were to grant the money to the shelter.

Commissioners reached the compromise of providing the zero-interest loan to the emergency shelter after weighing both the costs and benefits of funding the project.

Zoning issues and waste-water management were two of the other topics discussed in the meeting.

Students reveal anxiousness, excitement over auditions

By Monica Castro
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nichols Hall was filled with eager students anticipating their turn to audition last night for this semester's K-State theater productions.

Most students have spent weeks preparing for the open auditions, but there were a few who realized Tuesday night was the last opportunity to try out for the fall productions.

Whitney Noe, sophomore in electronic journalism, said she has had experience with acting throughout high school, though she was nervous for the audition because she did not know what to expect.

"I actually found out about the auditions tonight, so I went to the library to check out what the plays were about," she said.

For many of the students, anxiety was a theme while preparing and waiting to audition.

Sarah Hutchison, senior in anthropology, said she was nervous for the audition because she had not acted since high school.

"I was really active in theater and even did acting lessons in Kansas City," she said.

Hutchison, like many others auditioning, prepared for auditions by reading over the various scripts to choose which one was suitable for her. While she was considering many roles, she said there were some she would feel uncomfortable performing.

"If I could do any play, I would rather do 'Scapino' because it seemed like a lot of fun and a lot of laughs," she said.

While many students were open to various productions, Anthony Francisco, senior in vocal performance, said he only auditioned for the musical, "Fiddler on the Roof."

"I have a bigger passion for musicals than the other plays," Francisco said.

Though Francisco was anxious too, he said he was excited about auditioning.

"I am nervous because the auditions are different every year, and there are different people auditioning — you have more talent to compete with," Francisco said.

Though being on stage is his passion, Francisco said he had some previous experience working on backstage crews.

"I feel more nervous backstage because if you mess up backstage, it will mess up what is on stage," Francisco said. "Backstage is the backbone of the show."

Students who auditioned Monday or Tuesday night will find out about their status in the plays via phone calls today. If students are called back, they will need to return to Nichols Hall and audition between 7 and 10 p.m. today.

Education commissioner: Kansas experiencing record-high teacher shortage due to low pay, retirement

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — The state's top educator says Kansas faced a record teacher shortage two months ago but hopes the situation will improve with the start of the new school year.

Education Commissioner Alexa Posny, who appeared before a legislative committee Tuesday, said there were 1,144 vacancies in June among 37,000 teaching positions.

"That is the greatest number of vacancies we have seen at that point in time," Posny said. "We are working to fill the vacancies."

She said education officials will not know how many vacancies there are at the start of the 2007-08 school year until they check the 296 school districts next month.

Each district decides when its school year begins, though most already have started.

Posny said the greatest shortages are for teachers of special education, science, math, fine arts and English as a second language.

Contributing to the shortage has been teachers from the baby boomer generation reaching retirement age, fewer women becoming teachers because they can find work in other professions, and low pay.

"We know this is only the beginning because of the number of retirements we can expect over the next five years," she said.

The average starting salary for a Kansas teacher is around $28,000, which is about half the start pay for other professions like engineering, Posny said.

The Kansas National Education Association long has pushed for lawmakers to increase teacher pay.

"Low salaries is absolutely one of the things we have to do something about," said Sherri Yourdon, KNEA vice president.

"Even if somebody goes into education, they may never teach because other careers have higher salaries."

She said starting pay ranges from a low $22,000 in small western Kansas towns to a high of $40,000 in Johnson County.

Yourdon said there are not enough young people going into teaching to fill the void created by those retiring or leaving.

"Right now it's not a career they feel they can raise a family and have a decent living," Yourdon said.

Posny said education officials are trying different ideas to help fill the void.

One plan approved in June allows teachers to take a test to show they are qualified in an area other than their major. For instance, it would allow a history teacher who qualifies to teach English.

For the past two years, the state has allowed people with a particular expertise from a profession to teach that subject after receiving basic instruction in teaching.

Then they have three years to complete the requirements for teacher certification.

Another program around for several years allows a teacher to obtain a waiver to teach a subject other than their major but they have to become qualified in that area within three years.

That would allow someone who has been teaching in a regular classroom to move into special education if they can show they have some knowledge and ability in that area, Posny said.

In June, the State Board of Education did away with the requirement that teachers coming to Kansas from another state must have graduated from college with a 2.5 grade-point average on a 4.0 scale, which is not required of those graduating from a Kansas college.

Other states are abandoning college grade requirements for incoming teachers because they, like Kansas, also use rigorous standardized tests to examine how well teachers know their subjects and how to teach.

Improv comedy group to open McCain Performance Series season

By Cassandre Braden
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The McCain Performance Series will begin its 2007-08 season Aug. 31 with improvisation group Chicago City Limits.

Todd Holmberg, director of McCain Auditorium, said Chicago City Limits — a comedy group popular in New York City — was brought to McCain with the specific purpose of appealing to students.

"Our goal in a major university is to bring students all forms of fine arts including music, dance, theater and other specialty fine arts," Holmberg said. "We have a season that is pretty broad-based."

Thomas Jackson, McCain marketing and development assistant director, said there are several highlights this season that students can look forward to.

Jackson also said the per-

Open 11 a.m.-5 p.m. Monday through Friday
Tickets also can be purchased at www.k-state.edu/mccain.

Student full-season tickets are $75 (15 events at $5 each).

Student tickets are for K-State students 18 and older with a valid K-State ID card.

For more information on the 2007-08 performance series, call (785) 532-6428 or visit the Web site.

formance series is particularly special among universities, especially universities within the Big 12 Conference.

"There is a wide variety of programming," Jackson said. "There might be a group of students that love orchestras, ballets or musicals. We are hoping we covered all the bases this year."

The highlighted shows for the upcoming season include the musicals "Peter Pan," "Gypsy" and "Babes in Toyland."

"This season has a lot more variety as far as bringing in musicals, plays and variety shows," Jackson said.

When looking at which performers to choose, price and availability are considered first, Jackson said.

Next, careful consideration is taken to ensure that a wide variety of fine arts are covered during a four-year period.

"We want students to have the opportunity while they are here to witness all forms of fine arts," Jackson said.

However, Jackson also said the performers are selected to appeal to the entire Manhattan community.

K-State students perform during a rehearsal for Spring Dance in April in McCain Auditorium. "Chicago City Limits" will kick off McCain's fall lineup Aug. 31.

Summer program acquaints students to graduate-level research, K-State

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students from widespread universities came to K-State this summer for hands-on research experiences as part of the Summer Undergraduate Research Opportunity Program.

Carol Shanklin, acting dean of graduate school, is the coordinator for the program that attracts many undergraduate applications each summer.

"It is really designed for non-K-State students, but in the past we've had maybe one," she said. "It's a recruiting effort to bring students to the graduate program here."

Shanklin said about 15 students participate in the summer program that lasts nine weeks.

She said the program's intent is to recruit top-quality students.

"Basically, it started 13 years ago with the intent of helping recruit students into the science disciplines to go to graduate school and to provide them with research experience," she said.

This summer, students from universities in the United States and Puerto Rico lived in the residence halls while working on separate research projects with K-State mentors, she said.

Ruth Welti, professor of biology, supervised Brittanie Atkinson, a student who studies at Langston University in Langston, Okla.

Welti said Atkinson worked to develop a method to identify metabolites, which are found in plants.

"The reason for developing this method is so that we can measure how the metabolites change when the plants encounter environmental changes, such as changes in carbon dioxide levels," Welti said.

She said Atkinson had the chance to experience biological research.

"She is interested in a medical career," Welti said. "It's very helpful to physicians to have knowledge of the research process, as so many medical advances depend on that process."

James Shanteau, university distinguished professor of psychology, said he supervised a student this summer and has been involved with the program in the past.

"It's something I've done for a number of years, and it's always worked out very well," Shanteau said.

He said Kristen Fernandez, a student at the University of Puerto Rico at Mayaguez, worked with Mitch Ricketts, a graduate student in psychology, on his dissertation.

Fernandez's project was "Decision making with everyday products," for the two months she was at K-State during the summer.

Shanteau said the Department of Psychology chose the topic in advance and contacted Fernandez.

"She was quite interested so we mutually agreed on this particular project," he said.

Shanteau said though Fernandez is finished with the summer program, she is considering follow-up research in Puerto Rico.

He said some students decide to attend K-State for graduate research after participating in the summer program, while others go in different directions.

"It's an experience that doesn't always bring them here, but it does show them what graduate school is like," he said.

Shanklin said Michael Hinkin, graduate student in psychology, was the coordinator for this summer's program.

"His goal was to make sure they have, in addition to their mentors, a positive experience at K-State," she said.

Shanklin said the graduate school sends information about the program to institutions where the program's students have come from in the past, as well as institutions that have students greatly interested in K-State.

She said the program is only open to U.S. residents who are underrepresented like minority or first-year college students.

Grants for the program come from the National Science Foundation, which provides funding for three programs: grassland ecology and division of biology, mathematics and physics, she said.

Shanklin said the program provides students with a stipend of $2,500, room and board, and $300 for travel.

that we find," Michaels said. "So far there haven't been any issues, but it is a new program, and we're all learning."

Michaels, along with three full-time technicians, said he is certified to do maintenance on the laptops. One extra technician was hired specifically to handle issues with the laptops and OneNote software, and there is a hotline for students to call when problems arise, Michaels said. Wireless technology also will be available for students and faculty to purchase, Michaels said.

While veterinary medicine is the first college to switch to a paperless curriculum here, K-State is not the first university to do so. Medical colleges, particularly nursing and dental programs, across the country are making the switch to a more efficient paperless curriculum, Wilkerson said.

Students also have expressed their opinions on the new curriculum.

"This is absolutely much easier than carrying around a ton of books and binders for class," said Amy Keller, first-year student in veterinary medicine. "It is something we will definitely have to get used to, but I think we will all easily adjust to the new curriculum, and we feel pretty lucky to be the first group of students at the school to get to use the program."

Keller said her main concern was losing all of her information and notes if something happened to her computer.

"It's a relief to know that the CaTS team is there to help us with anything that goes wrong," Keller said.

Chris Hansen, first-year student in veterinary medicine, said he felt the paperless curriculum is a step in the right direction in making classes and studying more organized processes.

"It's a really good program and offers us a lot of freedom with our organization and note-taking," Hansen said. "I don't mind being a guinea pig."

COLUMN | Slogans not beneficial to team coming together as a team. But apparently that's OK.

"One of the things that I wanted to make sure to do was talk about having one goal, with one vision, and with one team," Prince said at K-State's Media Day. "We really have to understand what our mission is ... It is something bigger than ourselves."

All that is fine. I'm totally a fan of the whole becoming greater than the sum of the parts or whatever other cliché you can use. It just doesn't seem like you need a slogan to do that. In the end, having more talent and outworking the opponent has much more of an impact on the success of an upcoming season.

Again, maybe I'm wrong. Maybe athletes do need a catchy slogan to find some motivation.

Fans just better hope this slogan doesn't end up more appropriately used as a punch line.

recyclable," she said. "Use containers that are reusable."

Though most people consider recycling to be one of the best ways to help the environment, others believe it can cause more problems than it solves.

"Recycling is good for the environment, but it's not the best thing," said Megan Bindel, senior in biology and geography and president of Students for Environmental Action.

She said recycling is not always efficient and suggested other ways to help the environment, including using public transportation instead of driving, using Nalgene bottles instead of buying bottled water, and using both sides of a sheet of paper to write on.

"(Recycling) still takes a lot of transportation to move stuff around," Bindel said.

Justin Green, director of debate and instructor for speech communication, theatre and dance, also said recycling is not the best thing for the environment.

Aluminum is one of the only materials that can be recycled successfully, he said. Other materials such as plastic and paper use much more energy to be recycled, which is why recycled paper costs more than regular paper.

Also, he said the recycling process creates a toxic green sludge as a by-product that is bad for the environment.

Green said the problem is not with overfilling the landfills but with poorly designed landfills. There are plenty of places to put landfills he said, as long as they are well designed. These can be a great help to towns in dealing with their garbage, he said.

His suggestions for getting rid of junk and creating less trash is to use as many reusable items as possible and to buy locally.

"As much as possible, buy from places like farmers' markets," Green said.

While recycling might not be the best solution to environmental problems, it helps reduce the amount of trash produced, according to a report from the Environmental Protection Agency.

According to the report, 245 million tons of garbage was produced, which equals about 4.5 pounds of trash per person, every day in 2005.

That figure would have been about 325 million tons more had it not been for people recycling, according to the report.

Wilson urged people to recycle because the trash that goes to the landfill never gets filtered or sorted out.

"Recycling benefits a lot, not just the landfill space but all the products people own and have to make into new products," she said. "The value is seeing the process of all (people) can save from their own trash."

"Every product we take is recycled back into something new."

ASK THE FIFTH YEAR

Write to advice columnist

Welcome back, kids.

How was your summer? Good, no? Mine was fantastic. I'm the new Ask-the-Fifth-Year guy, and I'll be answering any questions you might have throughout the semester.

ADAM

Don't be afraid to ask anything. Whether you've got questions concerning roommates, friends, illegitimate children, parents, work, Halloween costumes, pie, bikes, No. 2 pencils, music, or anything really, just ask.

I'd be more than happy to help you out with some advice — please write in and ask away. It's not like I have anything better to do with my time.

This is where I'm supposed to tell you about myself. I'm 22, and I like to spoon. I'm from Topeka, though I've lived in Manhattan for the past four years. I play disc golf almost daily, and my favorite movie is "The Life Aquatic." My favorite band is The Who, followed closely by Sublime and Nirvana. In my opinion all pie is good pie. I hate people who are one-uppers and grapes with seeds.

I live in an attic with little to no air conditioning. I sweat. I'm a Reichenberger — it's what we do. We drink beer, grow hair and sweat.

I didn't used to lock my door ever, but the other week I woke up at 4:30 in the morning to the sound of a drunken stranger washing mud off his feet in my kitchen sink. He was nice, very talkative. Now I lock my door.

I'm also always looking to meet new people. About a month ago I met a random girl traveling across the nation and invited her into my home. We had a great time together, and she inspired me to travel alone. I went to Kentucky a couple weeks ago by myself. I had no real plan. I stayed in a hostel for $10 a night and 20 minutes of chores. I had to clean off the back porch. It was a blast.

I'm pretty laid back. I'm never in a hurry. My life is pretty stress-free. But that's not to say I don't have goals or ambitions.

When I graduate I'll be moving on to get my master's in economics, and then, hopefully, I'll be off to Spain from there.

Well, that's the best I can do in 448 words. But I am really looking forward to this school year and this column.

They both should be a lot of fun. So please write in with some questions. Serious or not — it doesn't matter. I'll try and make it worth your while. Have a good week. I'll talk to you later.

Adam Reichenberger is a fifth-year senior in mathematics and economics. Please send comments to edge@spub.ksu.edu.

8 bacon, egg, cheese sandwiches for less than $8By Adam Ingersoll
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Despite students often being tight on cash, they can still make a creative meal for less than $10. All it requires is a little imagination and faith in unusual mixtures of ingredients.

First, preheat the oven to 375 degrees.

Begin by starting with the bacon, because it will take the longest to cook. I usually open the entire package and cut the bacon in half, making the bacon an appropriate size to fit on the sandwich.

You will have enough bacon slices from one-half package that you can put the other half in a plastic bag and store in the refrigerator or freezer for later.

Fry the bacon on medium in a skillet. Fry each slice longer on each side for crispy bacon or less for chewy bacon. The type of skillet used, age of the stove and many other factors go into the time it takes to cook the bacon. Keep an eye on it while it is on the stovetop.

Also, you probably will not be able to fry all the bacon at once in one skillet, so you will have to fry it in several shifts. When your first strips of bacon are done, place them on a plate that has been covered with a few doubled-over paper towels to soak up excess grease.

Open the biscuits and space them evenly on a baking stone or cookie sheet. Place them in the oven for baking for the time listed on the package.

In a large bowl, scramble a dozen eggs. After they are scrambled, you can choose any number of ingredients to add to your eggs including, but not limited to, minced onions, salsa, sour cream, cottage cheese and spices in order to give them a special taste.

The idea when cooking the eggs is to cook them so they are a soft blanket rather than a crumbly mess. This helps them stay on the biscuit. After the eggs have cooked, treat the eggs like you would a hamburger patty on the grill — flip them rather than continuing to beat them after they begin to set up.

Eggs cook quickly, and when they are done, the bacon and biscuits should be nearly done as well.

Allow the biscuits to cool for a few minutes. Split each biscuit, add scrambled eggs, bacon and a slice of cheese, and then enjoy.

WHAT YOU NEED

Cost: $7.55 at Dillons
Time: 20 minutes
Serves: 8

Ingredients:

12 large eggs
1 pkg. jumbo buttermilk biscuits
1 pkg. American cheese slices
1 lb. bacon

Editor wants to better represent Manhattan on The Edge

Hello, my name is Eric Davis, and I am the editor of the Edge page of the Collegian.

If I had a dollar for every time I have introduced myself in that way over the past two weeks, I could literally retire.

In the past, the Edge page has been a little too hodge-podge for my liking — somewhat unfocused. I also feel the Manhattan scene was left out in the cold. The next logical question seems to be, "How are you going to make the Edge page different?"

The following content will be my main focus.

On Mondays, we will feature a local band. I don't mean local as in a 50-mile radius around Manhattan — I mean local bands that are from Manhattan.

Piggybacking on that, local shows are covered far too infrequently. I am going to do my best to feature at least one band and one concert a week. In a perfect newsroom, the concert coverage will be for the same band featured that week.

On Tuesdays, we will cover music and movie topics. This could be anything from a review of "Superbad" to a feature on the new "Batman" movie. I would like to keep this area fresh.

Wednesdays will be very different. A how-to section will run with tips and instructions on everything from how to change your oil to how to roll your own cigarette. If there is a topic you would like to see, send in your ideas.

Thursdays will feature the K-State theater productions, another area rarely found on the Edge. Find coverage of shows, theater news and many more topics from all of K-State's performance venues on this day.

Fridays are the days that are the most open. They will feature the "your life" section of the paper, and I am full of great ideas for what to include there. This week we have a sorority recruitment story, and next week we will have a new topic. Again, if there are stories you would like to see in this section, shoot me an e-mail.

I hope this article helps to make it clear that I am open to suggestions about the content of my page. E-mail me with comments, questions, concerns or whatever. Have a good semester.

Eric Davis is a senior in print journalism. Please send comments to edge@spub.ksu.edu.

Samsung releases 1.8-inch 160 GB hard drive; iPod update possible

Tuesday electronics giant Samsung announced it has developed a 160-gigabyte hard drive small enough to fit in an iPod.

The 1.8-inch hard drive has some in an excited state at the ramifications of the invention.

The largest iPod hard drive currently available is 80 GB, or up to 20,000 songs. If the 160-GB hard drive were to be used in a future iPod, it could hold up to 40,000 songs.

Whether the new hard drive will be included in the new iPods is unclear, but the rumors suggest the new iPod will be a full touch screen, like the iPhone.

Given the last new iPod was released more than a year ago, it stands to reason the new iPod release will be right around the corner. The last iPod update was Sept. 12, 2006. The average time between updates is 223 days, and it has been 345 days since the update.

K-State's Center for Engagement and Community Development held a conference-call meeting with people involved with the Greensburg, Kan., recovery efforts. About 40 individuals from different colleges, academic departments and organizations on campus gathered in Ahearn Field House 202. The discussion lasted about two hours and covered a variety of ways K-State can help with the recovery efforts.

K-State community to aid Greensburg

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State officials are in the process of compiling their resources in aiding Greensburg, Kan., rebuilding efforts.

About 40 people from different colleges, academic departments and organizations met with K-State's Center for Engagement and Community Development for a conference call with various people involved with the Greensburg community Wednesday afternoon.

Federal Emergency Management Agency coordinator Benjamin Alexander said FEMA officials had a ceremonial hand-off of recovery efforts to the Greensburg community on Aug. 15. About 10 FEMA workers were in Greensburg, which now has four part-time workers for 60 days, Alexander said.

"It really depends on the community capacity," said Alexander, who plans to work in Greensburg Monday through Wednesday for the next 60 days.

On May 4, an F-5 tornado with 205-mph winds hit Greensburg and Kiowa County. More than 90 percent of the structures in the community were severely damaged or destroyed.

FEMA enacted the Long-Term Community Recovery program, which included assistance from the State of Kansas and federal agencies. A 75-page Long-Term Community Recovery Plan for Greensburg, which community members developed, is now available on the town's Web site.

In the Long-Term Community Planning effort, a public-square model includes four sectors to help rebuilding efforts — government, education, business and health/community services. The four sectors will reinforce the long-term physical rebuilding efforts, said Terry Woodbury, president of Kansas Communities, LLC.

"The public square helped create a collective environment of community engagement that seems to be new for Greensburg," Woodbury said.

The plan also includes a list of future projects for the community's rebuilding efforts, which is subject to change, said Carmen Stauch, Kiowa County agricultural extension agent.

Latest rape a reminder to be safe

By Bridgette A. West
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students need to take safety precautions to protect themselves from attacks, a KSU police captain said.

"It is important to be aware of your surroundings when traveling to and from campus," said Capt. Don Stubbings of the KSU Police Department.

The most recent rape in the alleged serial rapes in Manhattan occurred at 4 a.m. on Aug. 7, according to a Riley County Police Department media release.

A male attacker entered a 20-year-old woman's residence with a handgun on the east side of town. The attacker was described as a 5-foot-10 white male with medium build, weighing 200-220 pounds with blue eyes.

Stubbings said he suggested students travel with a buddy at all times whether going to Aggieville, Wal-Mart or the grocery store.

When students go to bars or parties, alcohol can often impair their judgment. Groups often split up unconsciously, and that is the biggest mistake, Stubbings said.

The KSU Police Department has a program called Wildcat Walk. The program consists of a team of student volunteers who will walk students to their destination 24 hours a day. Stubbings said he suggests using Wildcat Walk if students feel uncomfortable walking alone. To use the service, students can call (785) 395-SAFE.

Stubbings also said having a phone on hand and using it if students have to walk by themselves can often deter anyone who might consider attacking. This also can ensure that someone will know something has gone wrong and call the police to describe the location where an attack might have happened.

When at home, students tend to relax and not worry about security, but with most of the alleged serial rapes occurring in the victims' residences, this is no place to let one's guard down.

"You should always lock the windows and doors when you are not home, no matter what," Stubbings said.

If students do not always close and lock windows or doors when they leave for brief periods of time, they might forget to lock them at a later point in time and face a higher risk of burglary, Stubbings said.

"I heard about the last rape and decided to buy a wooden dowel rod to put in the track of my sliding glass door so no one can come in through my balcony," said Jenna Wietham, sophomore in accounting.

Students are not the only ones making changes to their apartments, as local property owners also are taking steps to increase safety on their properties.

Tom Hollinberger, assistant director at Career and Employment Services, talks to students Wednesday afternoon about what CES has to offer for the College of Architecture, Planning and Design and the engineering department.

CES sponsors hot-dog lunch to raise awareness of services

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Quantrell Willis knows the importance of a strong résumé.

Willis, doctoral student in higher education student affairs, said he now has a job with K-State's Career and Employment Services because of the career development center at the University of Arkansas where he received his bachelor's and master's degrees.

The center helped him develop his résumé into a seven-page vitae.

"Thanks to the University of Arkansas career development center, I have a job with CES," Willis said. "When I saw the importance of it, I wanted students to get the same experience I had."

As a CES graduate assistant, Willis handed out free hot dogs, Pepsi cans and Frisbees to the line of students who extended past Holtz Hall at the fourth-annual CES Welcome Back Barbecue on Wednesday afternoon.

About 1,800 hot dogs were distributed to students before 1 p.m., Dottie Evans, CES assistant director, said. Student turnout at the barbecue was not unusual compared to past barbecues, she said.

"What we were really pleased with is how long the line was at 11 a.m.," Evans said. "We went through 1,000 hot dogs in the first 30 minutes. We were really pleased with the number of students who responded in the beginning."

More than 100 students also activated CES accounts in two hours and received free T-shirts, Evans said. Students can continue to activate accounts with CES, and the process takes less than five minutes, she said. An activated account provides students with e-mails regarding upcoming CES events.

Students must reactivate their CES accounts each academic year. Stephanie Ricke, senior in dietetics and public health nutrition, attended the barbecue last year and again this year to reactivate her account.

Ricke said she met with Mary Ellen Barkley, CES assistant director, in the past for a résumé critique and mock interview. The mock interview helped Ricke with her professional interviewing skills, she said, and she plans to have another with CES.

"Going into an interview initially is nerve-wracking anyway, so it's good to have some pointers to fall back on," Ricke said.

Jamie Hamor, CES graduate assistant, said she has worked with CES since the first Welcome Back Barbecue.

Hamor, master's student in college student personnel, said more students attend the barbecue each year, and it's easier in directing students to the advisers since they know what to expect.

"CES offers so much for students that it's almost hard for students to find out where to start," she said. "It's good for students to attend events like the barbecue so they learn about it a little at a time and learn about our resources and what we have to offer."

Violet Wright, junior in mechanical engineering; Jamie Espinosa, worker for information systems; and Kylee Weber, sophomore in business administration, grab food during the Career and Employment Services barbecue. This barbecue is held annually.

Through her experiences as a CES graduate assistant and student adviser, Hamor said she has a better perspective on what to include in her résumé and what to say during an interview.

"I have seen first hand the effects of utilizing what we have to offer," Hamor said. "If you come in and utilize our resources, it's never a bad thing."

CES also will have a campus-wide event today with its annual Part-Time Opportunities Fair in the K-State Student Union Ballroom.

"The barbecue and fair are kind of our kick-off events," Evans said.

"One of the main reasons to do the backyard barbecue is to welcome students back. We also know that students are anxious to get those part-time jobs, and it's important to do the part-time jobs fair in the first week."

ALDI, an international retail grocery, sponsored the barbecue. Evans said she hopes next year's sponsor will help with a bigger celebration since it will be the fifth-annual CES barbecue.

"I think students appreciated what we did," Evans said. "If we get stronger financial support from our sponsor, it'd be great if we could hand out 2,500 hot dogs."

Varney's to plant 10 trees as part of textbook-buyback plan

By Erin Fisher
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Varney's Bookstore and K-State Student Union Bookstore officials are finalizing plans for tree planting for textbook buybacks from the spring 2007 semester.

The eco-friendly textbook buyback plan will take place every semester, said Steve Levin, Union Bookstore manager.

The bookstores' plan was to plant one tree in the Manhattan community for every 3,000 books bought back at the end of the semester, Levin said.

The inspiration for helping the environment was not a new concept for the bookstores, Levin said.

"We've been selling recycled products for a long time," he said.

"We're all looking for ways to help with the environmental issue."

About 30,000 books were bought back from K-State students during the May 7-11 buyback period, and bookstore officials plan to plant 10 trees, Levin said.

The trees have not been planted yet for several reasons, he said.

"We wanted to wait until students came back," Levin said.

Varney's and the Union have been in touch with K-State's facilities to implement their eco-friendly plan, but now it is a matter of obtaining the available landscaping.

"We have a memorial and gift-tree program," said

Dea Brokesh, landscape architect for facilities planning. "Individuals and groups can donate toward that fund."

Brokesh said facilities officials will have to see if any conflicts arise with locations in the near future.

Levin said the bookstores have several factors to consider in the tree-planting process.

"Our hope is that we can get a map of the university where we can plant the trees," Levin said.

There also are a variety of trees to choose from, Levin said.

The bookstores' employees are thinking about posting a list of trees that can be planted for K-State students to select.

Levin offered several tips on how to contribute with helping the environment.

"We encourage reusing products to eliminate using plastic and paper," Levin said.

If there are any other ideas students have, Varney's and Union Bookstore officials would like to hear them, Levin said.

"(K-State students) are selling the books to make it happen," Levin said.

Elizabeth Galvan, senior in finance, said she was aware there were problems with the environment and global warming.

"I know there is pollution, especially here in Manhattan with all of the students coming back," Galvan said.

"It's a good idea; it's putting more into my environment."

Union to showcase 'Shrek'-themed activities expo

By Monica Castro
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students can have a fairy-tale experience at the "Shrek"-themed Union Expo and Activities Carnival in the K-State Student Union tonight.

The 8th-annual carnival, which will take place in Union Station, Union Courtyard and Bosco Student Plaza, and will have a "Getting Involved Is Never Far Away" and "Shrek" theme.

"There will be many activities taking place, such as a 'Shrek' movie-poster photo, a 60-second caricature artist, inflatable jousting in the Union Courtyard or Union Station, depending on the rain, and much more," said Jessica Pope, Union Program Council Community Committee member and senior in hotel and restaurant management.

There also will be free give-aways and prizes throughout the evening.

Gayle Spencer, coordinator of The Office of Student Activities and Services, started the event to provide students in the first week of school to find ways to get involved outside of the classroom.

room.

"The purpose of this event is to show what there is to get involved," said Ben Hopper, UPC program adviser.

UPC provides novelty games, booths, food and prizes at the carnival, Hopper said.

The OSAS also will feature student organizations at the event. About 185 student organizations will have displays at the carnival, said William L. Harlan, OSAS assistant coordinator.

Many groups including sport, academic, social, hobby and cultural organizations are among those that will set up booths at the activities carnival, he said.

"Involvement in student organizations is valuable for all students," Harlan said.

TO THE POINT

Varney's tree plan is flawed

The K-State Student Union Bookstore and Varney's in Aggieville will plant trees in an effort to combat the effects of global warming as part of a deal they made with students about book buybacks.

For every 3,000 books sold back to Varney's, they will plant one tree.

And with more than 30,000 books brought back to the stores, employees will plant 10 trees.

While the gesture of planting trees to combat global warming is admirable, the originality of said gesture is extremely lacking.

It seems that when most businesses want to be "greener," they all come up with the plan to plant more trees.

While the earth needs as many trees as it can get, there are more innovative steps the company could take to reduce the effects they have on the environment.

A cheaper, faster and underutilized option in "going green" is to use the energy-saving Twister light bulb model.

Each bulb uses considerably less energy than traditional light bulbs and last for years, rather than weeks.

When all is said and done, there will be only 10 trees planted, and it will take those trees many, many years to grow to a large enough size to have a positive outcome on the environment.

We hope more businesses will take the initiative Varney's has in promoting eco-friendly behavior, but we encourage more creative ideas for the process of going green.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Awareness of problem does not equal action

The fight to stop violence in Darfur scored a victory earlier this month when the U.N. Security Council passed a unanimous resolution to send a force of 26,000 soldiers to the Darfur region of Sudan.

After the resolution was passed, the world breathed a sigh of relief with hope that the people of Darfur might finally get the help they need. However, with three weeks passing and the details of the resolution coming to light, the people of Darfur do not seem any closer to actual relief.

This issue has stormed the world since the genocide began four years ago. It has inspired countless Facebook groups, MySpace pages and e-mail campaigns, demanding the world stand up and stop the violence. Their lack of effort is just as unsubstantial as the U.N. resolution.

The resolution seemed like just the answer, but there is only one hurdle left — actually sending the U.N. force where they are most needed.

According to BBC news on Aug. 17, the unanimously passed resolution, titled the United Nations-Africa Union Mission in Darfur, would create a joint force falling under the direction of the current Sudanese government. The hope of the United Nations was to appear as not overstepping Sudan's political autonomy.

The most conservative of estimates put the death toll in Darfur at 200,000 with more than two million Darfurians left without a home or food. Yet the directions will be handed down from the same government responsible for letting, if not inspiring, this genocide to occur. Does this sound right?

National Public Radio's Weekend Edition on Aug. 4 explained some of the more fine-print details of absolute absurdity within the U.N. resolution.

For example, U.N. soldiers are not allowed to take weapons from the Janjaweed Militia — those formally responsible for the violence.

Put another way, the U.N. soldiers would be violating law if they attempted to take away the same weapons used to kill men, kidnap women and murder children.

These U.N. soldiers would be breaking the law if they tried to take away bombs used to knock out entire families and villages.

The violence in Darfur started four years ago, and has shown this is the last place that can afford an empty promise of hope from an already late world.

This lack of necessary action from the United Nations is a signal of worse things to come. The only positive aspect is the world has rallied together enough to agree, at the very least, that genocide is bad and should be stopped. Yet after four years of the worst kind of violence, the world's reaction is lacking.

I'm reminded just how little is actually happening every time a new Facebook group is made advocating help to the people of Darfur.

Facebook groups are good, and they do provide information; however, the action can't stop with joining a group that knows the problem exists.

We sign up, we get the e-mails, but the action tends to stop there.

This problem of a genocidal government is not something for just the politicians and leaders of today to fix, but a problem of greater proportions to the world's future.

Had leaders of the past turned their heads to such an insurmountable problem, the world we live in would be a much different place. This is a global community; problems around the world no longer stay across the ocean.

The world's leaders were given four years and have presented what can only be charitably described as the Diet Coke of resolutions to go in and stop this violence.

We are coming into a big election year — look at what the candidates' stances are on foreign aid. Choose to hold our leaders accountable for actions in the global community.

Groups exclusive by definition, not discriminatory

When choosing a group or organization to join on campus or otherwise, one normally would select one that fits with their personality and character.

It would be odd, for example, for a fierce Republican to join the Young Democrats. The University of Florida, however, seems to think a group is more like a big welcome mat for the whole community.

According to Fox News, university officials told Beta Upsilon Chi, a Christian male fraternity, they would not be allowed to join the greek system or be recognized by Florida.

Their reasoning was it was considered discrimination for the fraternity to only allow Christian men to join. The men of Beta Upsilon Chi, countersued Florida for none other than discrimination.

Discrimination is a funny word. An important one, without doubt, but one that can be twisted to mean many things. What used to be a lightning-bolt word used to condemn those who kept people from the rights and freedoms they deserved is now being used to whine about a group of students who started a group devoted to personal beliefs.

The discrimination suit is becoming an epidemic in this country, as countless publications have printed articles with tales of groups being rejected for tailoring their criteria and beliefs to fit one set of people.

Fearful of leaving any person out in the rain, groups and organizations are being shut down or shunned because they lack the ability to serve everyone.

Organizations and groups are started because a group of people with the same beliefs, backgrounds or traits wish to get together and unite in their similarities. If one does not like what the group represents or stands for, here's a novel idea: don't join.

Florida seems to believe by not including atheists or women, feelings everywhere are being crushed and dreams are shattered. This might be a stretch, but there probably are not many atheists out there who have a deep longing to join a Christian organization. If they wished to join a group expressing their religious beliefs, they might be more apt to join an atheist organization.

The same goes for women. If a woman is upset she is not allowed to be a part of a Christian male fraternity, perhaps a more sensible solution would be to cease the protesting about discrimination and simply start an organization for women.

This is not an example of discrimination. An example of discrimination would be if the university allowed men to form organizations but not women.

This is not the case; it is a case of officials getting antsy at the thought of religion on campus.

Groups are a way for people to be around others like themselves. If groups were made to cater to the needs of everyone, the exclusivity of groups would be nonexistent.

We should be proud of all the differences in the world, not squelch them. Make more groups or clubs celebrating differences. When options are limited, recruit and begin a new one. And if you still think setting criteria for groups is a firm example of discrimination — well, start a group about it.

Board of Education discusses improvements

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 Facilities and Growth Committee discussed school security and modernization at its meeting Wednesday.

Mike Mayo, district consultant, led the meeting and explained the current study and possible reconstructive future for District 383's elementary, secondary and high schools.

Mayo said there is a lot of inequality across the schools, but the goal of the committee is to increase the level of quality in each school and ultimately eliminate the haves and have-nots.

Some of the major ideas proposed included adding more classrooms to the elementary schools; adding gymnasiums, a special education suite and presentation rooms for the middle schools; a complete renovation of restroom facilities and interior finishes for the high-school campuses; and upgraded security and safety devices for all schools in the district.

"Bringing it up aesthetically would make (the schools) look much better and address safety issues as well," Mayo said.

New lock systems on all doors, friable asbestos removal, additional smoke detectors, increasing exits and adding fire sprinklers in each building were the safety improvements addressed.

Beth Tatarko, Manhattan-Ogden Board of Education president, said the scope of the study is to look ahead and probably will be a 15 year project which is subject to change.

"One of the big concerns we have in this district," Tatarko said, "is we have a lot of things that simply need to be repaired and fixed up. In about a month, there will be a more concrete plan, but it's going to change a lot even then."

Readers prefer drug-free ideologies

Editor,

I would like to comment on some things from Scott Girard's column, "K-State students can learn from KU ideologies."

First, he says people in Lawrence "think more about the issues." Just what issues does he mean?

Girard is operating under the assumption that whatever topics they are thinking about are actually valid societal concerns and those of us who aren't actively debating them are somehow backward.

Secondly, he doesn't define the idea of "free thought." The truth is his "free thought" is not of clear-headed people but rather the mindset of drug-induced stupidity.

The form of free thought he refers to is the one that ignores right and wrong and views all beliefs (except traditional Judeo-Christian ones) as equally valid.

I would contend allowing oneself to believe anything (or nothing) regardless of right and wrong, truth or falsehood, and then "thinking" about it all day, is not a sign of enlightenment — it's a sign of foolishness.

Lastly, he seems to promote an homogenization of thought within our society. Just because our neighbors might be on it doesn't mean we should all jump on the free-love and LSD bandwagon.

Isn't one of the "liberal values" diversity? Yet he disparages the relatively traditional views held by many of his peers. His friends in Lawrence can trip all over Mass Street if they want, but I for one am hoping K-Staters will maintain some of the traditional American spirit that has made our country and school great.

Ian Matthews
SENIOR IN LIFE SCIENCES

Editor,

I support the First Amendment 100 percent, but Scott Girard and his column, "K-State students can learn from KU ideologies," is an embarrassment to the university. If he wants to explore new mind-freeing drugs he can't seem to get his hands on in Manhattan, then he should move to Lawrence where the law enforcement is apparently much less stringent.

I'm not sure what makes him feel qualified to generalize the values and beliefs of over 23,000 students. For being such an "objective free-thinker," I failed to locate a single unbiased argument in his liberal rhetoric.

Looks like he is well on his way to a bright future in the left-winged media. For his sake, I hope they don't perform drug tests.

Basketball will steal spotlight

This summer I watched freshman Michael Beasley play for the under-19 USA National team at Moody Coliseum at Southern Methodist University in Dallas.

RYNE WITT

I also watched sophomore quarterback Josh Freeman play 11-on-11 at Saturday's open practice.

Freeman threw incompletions, while Beasley dominated the competition.

That led me to the conclusion that, for the first time in my lifetime, K-State basketball will be more exciting than K-State football this season.

First of all, there's Beasley. I think he will be a bigger version of former Texas player Kevin Durant.

He is thicker, and dare I say, more athletic than Durant. The technical aspects of Beasley's game are not as finely tuned as Durant's, but it's scary to think how good Beasley could be with some coaching.

Then there are the coaches. Frank Martin used to be a bouncer in Miami (which is exciting in general). He is honest, up front about his past and seems like a straight-shooter.

He is following the footsteps of his former boss, Bob Huggins.

Second-year football coach Ron Prince is very calculated with his approach. To his credit, he has perfected the technique of shielding his players from the spotlight.

At the same time, he leaves fans and media with more questions than answers.

Prince has the Vanier Football Complex sealed as tight, or maybe tighter, than legendary coach Bill Snyder did, which means football story lines will be vanilla at best.

Basketball, meanwhile, will be full of interesting stories.

How will Martin handle being a head coach? How will Bill Walker's knee hold up?

Can K-State make the NCAA tournament for the first time since 1996, when I was 11 years old?

Can K-State continue to bring in top recruits without Huggins?

I am not saying the football team will have a terrible year, but Prince's squad has a lot to prove.

The basketball team, on the other hand, has the opportunity to be great.

K-State has a deadly trio of Beasley, Walker and senior David Hoskins.

The Wildcats are going to make plenty of noise on a national level by playing and beating highly rated opponents, like the football team did last year by beating Texas.

However, my mindset could change if the football team beats Auburn on Sept. 1.

'82 Cats swap season for bowl bid

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The "Wildcat Archives" series will take a look back at a different K-Stater every week who was part of an important time in Wildcat sports history.

When it comes to games, Steve Physioc is an early bird.

As the radio voice of the Wildcats from 1979 to 1982, he would arrive at the stadium hours before the game to go over notes and study the roster. Messing up a name would be a nightmare.

While some consider those futile years in the history of K-State football, Physioc saw the passion of K-State fans, who already were firing up their grills and prepping for the game as he stepped out of his car and walked up to what was then known as KSU Stadium.

Fans from Salina, Topeka and even small towns and farms from Western Kansas showed up early to cheer on their Wildcats, many of whom also represented the same small communities.

"One of the great things was so many of the kids who go to K-State are from Kansas, and back then, so many of the football players were from Kansas too," Physioc said. "There was a great community feeling with people showing up to pull for their high school friends."

Despite the support from the diehards, the stadium was still only three-quarters full on most Saturdays. These were, after all, the dark ages of K-State football.

The Wildcats were sandwiched between two of college football's elitists. To the north, Tom Osborne and Nebraska consistently finished in the Top 10. Down south, Barry Switzer had the Sooners competing not just for the Big 8 title but also for the National Championship every year.

Physioc, who grew up in Merriam, Kan., and called games for the campus radio station while attending K-State in the mid 1970s, knew all too well about the struggles of K-State football. When the Wildcats would win a game, especially against their rival to the east and fellow Big 8 bottom feeder Kansas, the result would be a giant party in Aggieville, complete with goal posts being toted down Moro Street and mobs of fans starting bonfires.

"But it was a peaceful, joyful mob," Physioc said. "It was kind of like releasing the air, like, 'Ah man, we got it done.' The victories were so few and far between that you really rejoiced during those moments."

The idea was no one could win in Manhattan. The Wildcats won a total of just 36 games during the '70s, were on their seventh coach since 1950, and had managed only three winning seasons during that time.

There was also K-State's bowl record, 0-0. In the program history, the Wildcats never had reached the goal that every team strives for.

But Jim Dickey, who coached K-State from 1978

SAN FRANCISCO 49ERS

Former running back reaches NFL dream

By Jeffrey Rake
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Even before he arrived at K-State as a transfer student in 2003, Thomas Clayton, whose strong build and bulging biceps earned him the nickname "T-Gun," always knew he'd end up in the National Football League.

It was his dream, his destiny, and nothing, he said, was going to deny him.

Not a highly publicized run-in with a parking services employee in September 2005, which ultimately led to a pair of suspensions and a misdemeanor battery conviction.

Not a midseason benching during his senior year in 2006, one that saw him go from starting running back to third on the depth chart in a one-week span.

And certainly not his ensuing knee injury, which required arthroscopic surgery.

Sure, there were plenty of questions leading up to last April's NFL Draft. Would Clayton's off-field indiscretions overshadow his on-field talents? Was his junior season (637 yards, four touchdowns) good enough to cover up a disappointing senior campaign? Could he stay healthy?

Yet through it all, Clayton said he knew he'd get his chance. That's why he wasn't surprised when he was drafted by the San Francisco 49ers in the sixth round. In fact, he couldn't believe it took so long.

"I was kind of upset that I didn't get drafted earlier," said Clayton, an Alexandria, Va., native. "But to get selected, period is an honor and a blessing."

Clayton, who originally attended Florida State after being named a SuperPrep All-American out of Mount Vernon (Va.) High School, already has raised some eyebrows in his short stint with the 49ers.

In his second preseason game, Clayton scored a game-winning fourth quarter touchdown against the Oakland Raiders, a one-yard plunge that gave the 49ers a 26-21 win. He finished with 42 yards rushing on 10 carries, raising his preseason total to 97 yards.

School-record 12 national TV appearances highlight 2007-08 men's basketball schedule

STAFF REPORT

With 12 nationally televised games and two high-profile tournament appearances, it appears K-State's much-anticipated men's basketball schedule was worth the wait.

The schedule, released Wednesday, includes five contests on ESPN and trips to the Old Spice Classic in Orlando, Fla., and the Jimmy V Classic at Madison Square Garden in New York City.

"We think that we have put together a schedule that is as challenging as any Kansas State team has faced in some time," coach Frank Martin said.

"We are going to face at least five teams in the non-conference schedule that advanced to the NCAA Tournament last season plus the always-grueling Big 12 Conference slate.

"It's an exciting time to play teams like this because they are going to be a great experience for our young team."

The 12 nationally televised games surpass the previous school record of 10 appearances set last season.

ESPN's "Big Monday" crew will be on hand for a home contest against Texas on Feb. 25. ESPN will broadcast three other conference games — Jan. 19 against Texas A&M, Feb. 9 against Oklahoma State and March 1 at KU.

For those already marking their calendars, KU visits Manhattan on Jan. 30.

effort for the whole community," Staugh said. "This is the goal of the community in how to proceed forward."

Center for Engagement and Community Development director David Procter and Dan Kahl, center extension liaison, met with Greensburg residents Aug. 2 regarding K-State assistance in rebuilding.

In talking with Greensburg residents, Procter said one of the community's top needs is for a strong grant writer who can help gain funding for the rebuilding efforts.

The center's philosophy is to help meet community needs, which includes connecting K-State's resources with those needs, Procter said.

One difficulty Greensburg residents are experiencing is the amount of resources that are available to them from a land-grant university like K-State, Woodbury said. At a public steering committee meeting Wednesday, Greensburg residents appointed seven people who are responsible in hiring a resource coordinator/librarian.

"Once that person is in place, we should be able to better respond to the resources available out there to us," Woodbury said.

The Greensburg community hired a Wichita-based architectural firm for its downtown planning, Staugh said. Another architectural firm based in Baltimore also is interested in building a factory and several houses in Greensburg, Staugh said.

While the College of Architecture, Planning and Design did not have a timely response to the Greensburg tornado since it occurred during spring semester finals, several professors want to use the Greensburg situation in their classroom studios, said Dennis Law, dean of the College of Architecture, Planning and Design.

"We want to see how we can help with future disasters," Law said.

Center for Engagement and Community Development officials plan to continue their communication with K-State Research and Extension officials in providing the names and resources for Greensburg residents, Kahl said. A disaster response team of about five people formed after Wednesday afternoon's meeting.

"I think we heard a really strong interest in convening a group who will continue helping," Kahl said.

1982 | Broadcaster recalls bowl year

to 1985, was about to change that.

Though former coach Bill Snyder owns nearly every first when it comes to K-State football, it was Dickey who finally clinched a bowl berth 1982. Like Snyder, who popularized junior-college recruiting and cupcake scheduling during the '90s, Dickey had to turn to an unconventional move to put K-State in the postseason.

After enduring three losing seasons, Dickey decided to go against the grain and sacrifice the 1981 season so he could make a run at a bowl game in 1982. He redshirted eight players who started as juniors, including his son and star quarterback Darrell Ray Dickey, hoping to load up on experience for one season.

"Jim said, 'We could continue to eke out maybe three or four wins a year and maybe with some fortune get five wins, or we can sacrifice and say we are going to put together a lot of experience on the field for one year and roll the dice and see what happens,'" Physioc recalled.

What happened was the first 3-0 start ever. What happened was K-State was televised three times. What happened was the Wildcats won six games, which earned them an invite to the 1982 Independence Bowl.

"They won the six games that year which was remarkable, but they had to sacrifice," Physioc said. "The excitement at the school when they beat Colorado and clinched the bowl berth was unbelievable. I remember K-State returning a kickoff when the game was kind of over and scoring a touchdown off it, and the entire stadium poured onto the field and ran down the sidelines with him."

Despite the historic season, the Wildcats were not able to win their bowl game against Wisconsin, falling 14-3.

Dickey wasn't able to test his mass redshirting plan for a second bowl-game run though. He lasted two more years before Lee Moon replaced him in 1985.

Still, Physioc believes the fans understood why Dickey did what he did and appreciated that one year of glory amid so many seasons of despair.

"Any time in a smaller market, particularly in the Midwest, the school, the university, the athletic programs mean so much to the community," said Physioc, who now broadcasts baseball games for the Los Angeles Angels of Anaheim.

"More so than in a bigger city like where I live in Los Angeles."

"Even when K-State football was not doing well, the community showed up, and they supported them."

K-State's Thomas Clayton celebrates with the section of Wildcat fans Saturday following K-State's 21-19 win over Marshall on Sept. 10, 2005.

touchdown, that was exciting not only for myself but for our team," Clayton said. "It's something to help us build on."

But it remains to be seen whether the 49ers will keep Clayton on their 53-man regular-season roster.

Matt Barrows, a 49ers beat writer from Sacramento, said Clayton has a ways to go.

"Early on, there was some feeling that he could challenge for the No. 3 job at running back," Barrows said. "However, at this point he is still very much No. 4."

Clayton said he doesn't pay attention to roster moves, adding that he's not sure when those decisions will be made. Instead, he's simply trying to make progress and improve his play in practice.

"I'm getting better and better each week," Clayton said. "I'm still learning, but at the same time I'm able to make plays."

As for his time at K-State, Clayton said he doesn't hold a grudge toward coach Ron Prince, whose decision to bench some of the team's seniors in favor of underclassmen received some criticism last season.

"A lot of people around the program didn't agree with it," Clayton said. "But again, he was a first-year head coach at the time, he made a decision, and that's how things went."

Clayton said he talked with Prince but never received a clear answer as to why things went the way they did.

Now, he says, he's pleased with the way it all turned out.

"I'm in the NFL now, and I'm happy with the position I'm in," Clayton said.

questions rise about safety options, we would definitely listen and do whatever we reasonably can to make our tenants feel safe," said Todd Thae-mert, owner of T-N-T Rentals. Most of the buildings

Thaemert owns already have several locks, including dead-bolt locks, sliding bolt locks and doorknob locks, he said.

The University Crossing apartments have added more video surveillance around the club house, said Scott Manning, complex manager.

University Crossing has had security buttons located at the entrance of every apartment and bedroom, he said.

The complex also has security guards who do patrols. They are there for noise issues but help a great deal in keeping the tenants safe, he said.

SHAPE offers sex education

Many K-State students who have returned to Manhattan for the fall semester are searching for new activities to fill their spare time.

Student groups typically take advantage of this potential membership booster by advertising their causes and recruiting students.

MATT COMBES

Sexual Health Awareness Peer Education is one group that has worked during the summer to plan for a busy fall semester.

SHAPE is a peer-education group that enlists college students to educate their classmates on the importance of practicing safe sex. The members are trained through a three-credit-hour class that gains them Red Cross HIV/AIDS Educator certification.

During the class, members learn about HIV/AIDS and other STDs.

Members also are trained on how to share this information in ways that are interesting and fun. One example is the Condom Comeback activity, which teaches students how to respond to common excuses for not using protection.

After the first-semester certification, a member has a one-year obligation to the group. However, many members stay for as many semesters as their schedules allow.

SHAPE's most popular services are its classroom and housing presentations. Professors, residence assistants and greek houses can request for a group of SHAPE educators to come in and go through a series of activities and lessons on how to practice safe sex. These presentations are known for being entertaining.

SHAPE also brings events and speakers to the K-State campus. One annual event is the visit from David Coleman, the real-life Love Doctor. This event will be this year on Sept. 11. Coleman speaks to students about relationships, dating and other practical love issues. His presentations are known on campuses nationwide for their entertaining, educational value.

In addition to doing its own projects, SHAPE has joined forces with other student and community groups to form Inspiring Community Awareness Now – or I.CAN.

I.CAN is an umbrella organization that promotes collaboration on large-scale public outreach pertaining to HIV/AIDS. I.CAN's premier project is the Manhattan HIV/AIDS Awareness Week. During this week, the committee sponsors events to get the campus and community active in raising HIV/AIDS awareness.

Though the semester already has begun, SHAPE will have a last-minute enrollment. If interested, visit www.ksu.edu/lafene/SHAPE. Also, I.CAN has no class obligation, so contact i.can@ksu.edu.

This is a weekly column written by a member of Sexual Health Awareness Peer Educators and edited by Carol Kennedy, director of health promotions at Lafene Health Center. If you would like SHAPE to answer a sexual health question, please contact SHAPE at shape@ksu.edu.

Most drivers should plan to change their oil every 3,000 miles or once every three months.

Changing own oil can cut vehicle-maintenance costs

By Adam Ingersoll
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After changing your oil, you should check the oil level.

By checking the reading on the dipstick, you will know if you have added the right amount of oil.

WHAT YOU NEED

4-5 quarts oil
Oil filter
Oil pan
Ratchet set or crescent wrench

Oil is the lifeblood of your car, and changing it yourself can be thrifty and self-satisfying.

However, you could run into some serious and expensive car problems if the oil is changed improperly. You should not attempt to change the oil if you are not somewhat mechanically inclined. If you think you are up to the task and wish to save a few bucks, consult your vehicle's owner's manual for oil change specifications and locations before you begin.

When purchasing oil, it is best on your engine to be consistent and to use oil within the specifications of your owner's manual. A viscosity of 5W-40 or 10W-40 and a capacity of four to five quarts is typical.

The oil filter should be changed once every two oil changes. The correct filter can be found with the assistance of the sales clerk at the auto parts store.

You can purchase an oil pan if you prefer, however, you usually can make one out of something around the house. Milk jugs or any plastic container with a lid will do nicely.

When changing the oil, it might be necessary to jack up low-clearance vehicles.

It is a good idea to let your car cool if you recently have driven your vehicle at all.

Once under the vehicle, locate and loosen the oil-drain plug. Before you remove the plug, completely make sure the oil pan is beneath the drain and the oil is not too hot.

After the engine has cooled, remove the oil cap on the top of the engine after the oil drain plug.

Allow the oil to drain while you locate and remove the oil filter – usually on the side or back of the engine block – and replace it with the new one.

Once the oil is completely drained into the oil pan, replace the oil-drain plug and tighten with your wrench or ratchet.

You will have to get the plug off to change the oil next time, so do not over tighten it. However, do not leave it so loose that it will unscrew and drain oil on the road.

Using a funnel, refill your engine with clean oil to the capacity recommended by your owner's manual.

Check the oil level by removing the dipstick, wiping it clean with a rag, reinserting it all the way and removing it once more for a clean reading. If the level looks appropriate, replace the oil cap and close the hood.

'High School Musical 2' album debuts at No. 1; film draws 17M viewers

Any doubts that the Disney Channel could recreate the success of last summer's "High School Musical" were silenced when the soundtrack for "High School Musical 2" debuted at No. 1 on the charts. Selling 615,361 copies, it is the second-largest debut of the year.

Adding more momentum to "High School Musical," last week's debut of the musical attracted more than 17 million viewers, making it the most-watched basic cable show of all time.

Caribou Coffee celebrates ribbon cutting

By Jacque Haag
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The hot weather might have deterred some from gathering around the fireplace in the shop, but about 200 people still gathered around Caribou Coffee for its ribbon-cutting ceremony Thursday.

The coffee shop in the K-State Student Union, known for its lodge style with leather chairs and a limestone fireplace, also was decorated with balloons for the 2 p.m. celebration.

By 1:45 p.m., about 50 people already had gathered on the north side of the shop, waiting for a chance to get one of the 100 free Caribou Coffee travel mugs offered to the first visitors.

Caribou Coffee workers handed out chocolate mocha granola bars and snapped Polaroid photos of those waiting in line. The subjects of the photos were allowed to keep the pictures, each with a Caribou Coffee logo on the bottom.

Because there was no microphone available at first, the ceremony was off to a slow start, but the line only grew longer.

After an introduction, Piper Hoskins, Union Corporate Board president, and Sarah Morton, Union Governing Board president, welcomed those gathered on behalf of all the Union councils.

"We're very excited to have Caribou Coffee on campus, as we are the first university in the United States to have one on campus," Morton said.

A small group, including Hoskins and Morton, gathered at the entrance to the shop to hold the giant scissors for the ribbon cutting.

First, the group cut a red ribbon, and then Chartwells - the contracted food service in the Union - brought out a "ribbon" of 100 $1 bills to be cut and donated to an unnamed charity.

Tina Griffin, Union food service director, said the coffee shop has been well-received.

Griffin said people in the K-State community might not know about Caribou Coffee yet, which is why Union officials chose to sponsor the ribbon cutting Thursday instead of when the shop first opened this summer.

"(The ceremony timing) was basically due to the students being back," she said. "It's for the students, so we

Carnival gives organizations chance to recruit

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kylea Meneilly stood first in line with a baseball bat raised above her head as her six friends counted to three.

Meneilly, freshman in pre-journalism and mass communications, slammed the metal baseball bat down into an old car decorated with "KSU Roller Hockey" and spray-painted hockey stick designs.

"We were going to go bowling in the Union, but we thought it looked cool," Meneilly said.

Along with her friends, Meneilly paid $1 to participate in the car slam, which helped raise money for KSU Roller Hockey. About 185 organizations, including the KSU Roller Hockey Club, participated in the eighth-annual Union Expo and Activities Carnival Thursday night at the K-State Student Union.

The car slam, a first for KSU Roller Hockey, charged participants $1 per slam and $5 for six slams, said Zac Buckmiller, KSU Roller Hockey president and junior in architectural engineering. Participants wore borrowed roller-hockey jerseys while hitting the car, and the group raised about $170 through the car slam.

"I was trying to look for a way for fundraising while getting our name out," Buckmiller said. "We know a lot of new students will be out at the fair, so we're trying to get our name out while raising money."

The organization, which has about 20 members, has a $200 annual membership fee in addition to its travel costs, Buckmiller said. KSU Roller Hockey travels about eight times a year to Denver and St. Louis for its tournaments, he said.

"It's one of the most expensive sports, so

Contest to raise aid money

By Willow Williamson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An ice-cream-making contest will start the events at the U-turn music and ice cream festival Saturday in City Park.

Festivities include the contest, music from local and out-of-town bands and a hot-dog dinner. The bands will play from 3 to 10 p.m. at the Larry Norvell Band Shell in City Park.

"It's really no cost, just come as you are," said Lance Stafford, member of the festival's planning committee.

While other activities are free of charge, the cost to participate in the contest is $25 for a business or organization and $15 for an individual. All the proceeds, as well as any donations, will benefit Greensburg, Kan., the small town demolished by a tornado in May. "I enjoy watching the local bands and supporting them," said Amanda Ratzliff, junior in apparel and design.

Rules for the contest include making all of the ice cream on site, Stafford said. Participants must bring all the ingredients and equipment for making their ice cream, though refrigeration will be provided.

Registration for the contest begins at 1:30 p.m.

The Real Life Church is sponsoring the festival for the third year.

The past two years' proceeds went to Hope Ranch Therapeutic Riding Center.

Former Kansas attorney general advocates use of marijuana for medical reasons

By Whitney Hodgin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Former Attorney General of Kansas Bob Stephan said he did not use medicinal marijuana during struggles earlier in his life with lymphoma and bladder cancer, but the 74-year-old advocate wants it to be an option for those who need it most.

Speaking at a press conference at the statehouse last Friday on behalf of terminally ill patients of afflictions like epilepsy, cancer, AIDS, anxiety disorder and multiple sclerosis, Stephan encouraged Kansas citizens to sign a petition that would allow physicians to recommend marijuana for medical purposes.

The conference was hosted by the Kansas Compassionate Care Coalition, a 400-member grassroots organization based in Lawrence. Determined to add Kansas to a growing list of states that already have partial-legalization laws, KSCCC asked Stephan, the longest-serving attorney general in Kansas history, to lend his public figure to their cause, according to the Associated Press.

"I am convinced we have a moral and ethical responsibility to protect law-abiding citizens from the risk and traumas of arrest, prosecution and conviction and prison simply because they're attempting to gain relief from a serious condition," Stephan said.

Twelve states allow the prescription and use of medicinal marijuana in varying degrees, which is in direct opposition to federal laws banning all use and possession of the drug.

According to the New England Journal of Medicine, an estimated 115,000 Americans who live in one of the 12 states have obtained physician recommendations to use marijuana for medicinal purposes.

For example, licensed caregivers can grow limited amounts for their patients, or patients can grow it themselves.

Partial-legalization, however, does not necessarily provide full-protection, as was the case in California - the first state to enact a partial-legalization law. Last month police helped federal agents raid 10 local medicinal marijuana dispensaries and arrested all involved parties in California.

Under current Kansas law, a first-time offender will receive a misdemeanor, a fine up to $2,500 and a year in prison if caught smoking, selling or growing marijuana.

Cultivation of more than four plants, however, including for medical use, is a felony worth 11 to 17 years in prison.

"Marijuana is completely natural and not addictive like painkillers," said Amber Hoskins, a Manhattan resident who suffers from chronic back pain. "The prescriptions they give out today are too powerful - they damage the liver and stomach lining. Marijuana is even safer than alcohol, and so much easier on the body."

"I'd prefer that as an alternative to being on pills all the time."

Opponents to medicinal marijuana feel enough options are already available to pain sufferers. For example, they have access to legal cannabinoid medicines such as Marinol and Cesamet. These are both marijuana-based and federally approved.

Alicia Staats, junior in psychology, said she understands the benefits of medicinal marijuana but is worried partial-legalization could lead to a dependence on the drug.

"I wouldn't keep a terminally ill patient from smoking medical marijuana," she said, "but I wouldn't condone prescribing it under any other

Welcome Day reveals opportunities for K-State freshmen, transfers

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Willie the Wildcat cutouts, purple streamers and purple and white balloons decorated the centers of each table, while student volunteers handed out Call Hall ice-cream floats at the K-State Alumni Center on Thursday.

Homecoming Committee, Wildcats Forever and Student Alumni Board members gave information about their organization to students who passed their tables.

The sixth annual Wildcat Welcome Day provided new students with an invitation into the Alumni Center and attracted about 500 students, said Andrea Bryant Gladin, Alumni Association associate director of alumni programs.

"We want to reach out to new students during their first week of class and welcome them to K-State," she said. "We try to get as many students as we can involved in our programs so that they're knowledgeable about what the Alumni Association does for students."

Bryant Gladin said Alumni Association members purposefully plan Wildcat Welcome Day on the same day as the Union Expo and Activities Carnival each year.

"It's a good day for freshmen and transfer students to come learn more about K-State," she said.

One of the Alumni Association's groups, the Student Alumni Board, is a select group of about 35 students who apply during the spring semester and remain on the board until their senior year. Sarah Devlin, senior in biochemistry, joined Student Alumni Board as a sophomore after she learned about it from her friends.

"They said it was their favorite activity on campus and that it was a good way to get involved," Devlin said.

Devlin, who also has participated in Wildcats Forever and Homecoming events, said the Alumni Association provides students with another K-State outlet.

"I've had a chance to learn more about the K-State family," she said. "It's given me an opportunity to see K-State from a bigger perspective, and it's really been one of the best experiences I've had here."

Transfer students also attended Wildcat Welcome Day. Chelsea Shrack, a transfer student from Pratt (Kan.) Community College, said she learned about the event from the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry.

Shrack, senior in animal sciences and industry, said she plans to learn about the Alumni Association's organizations and then possibly join one.

"I think it's important for us to have resources to get involved," she said. "Also, it's not only to learn about the school but to meet people and see the activities."

John Lantz, junior in accounting, is a first-year member on the Student Alumni Board's Wildcats Forever Committee. He said he joined the board after he met several members.

"It's opened a lot of doors for me," he said. "There are a lot of different people from different areas on campus.

"It's interesting to hear about what they're involved with other than Student Alumni Board."

TO THE POINT

Dog park a good approach

Let's face it. Dogs have been getting a bad rap lately.

With all the news about Michael Vick and the dangerous dog laws in Manhattan, it's getting harder to find a good place to take pets so they can run off all their energy.

Dogs are rambunctious creatures. They need space so they can release their frustrations from being cooped up in houses and pens all day. That's why Manhattan resident Lynne Rathbone's plan to build a dog park in Anneberg Park would help dogs that usually are confined to cages or tiny yards and need an area where they can run and play.

The park would be divided into sections, separating smaller breeds from larger breeds, to prevent bigger dogs from hurting smaller ones. There also would be other regulations to make it as safe as possible. For instance, all dogs must be licensed, and no dangerous dogs with violations would be allowed.

Chaining up dogs all day has been proven to make dogs more aggressive. In many communities, anti-tethering laws have been passed to decrease dog aggression.

So far, Schumacker already has raised $10,000 for the dog park, but the estimated cost is more than $70,000. Considering all the tension surrounding dogs these days, it would be in Manhattan's best interest to help her raise the rest of the funds to build this park.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Secondhand effects

Funding insurance with sin taxes will damage world markets

Like pulling a rabbit from a hat, the U.S. government is attempting to deceive the American public on acquisition of funds for an expansion of the State Children's Health Insurance Program.

BRETT KING

This magic show of hiding where the money comes from will be a costly game of smoke and mirrors, causing financial effects on the United States as well as markets outside of its borders.

According to the Los Angeles Times, the Senate Finance Committee pushed through a new spending bill attempting to provide health insurance for an additional six million children in working and lower-class families across the country.

The bipartisan-supported plan calls for the raising of tobacco taxes as a means of generating funds to support this expansion. However, tobacco taxes historically have not provided the funds necessary on state levels to provide health care and education.

Under the new bill, current federal cigarette taxes would increase from 39 cents to $1 per pack, or a 256-percent increase. Import taxes on cigars would increase from 5 cents to $10 each a 20,000-percent increase.

A 256-percent tax increase on cigarettes for the expansion of the current SCHIP is an unfair tax upon the lower and working classes in America.

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention reported a majority of cigarette smokers reside below the poverty line, forcing lower-income families to shoulder most of the debt of the new youth insurance program.

Over the past few decades, the amount of cigarette smokers in the United States has decreased in correlation with the amount of taxes implemented upon the product. Kansas' state government, like many other state governments, has experienced the financial constraints of relying on tobacco taxes to fund healthcare programs.

Researchers at the Heritage Foundation concluded, "In just five years, Congress will need more than nine million new smokers."

Reauthorizing the program from 2013 to 2017 would require almost 22.4 million new smokers by the end of the period."

The financial shortcomings, which result from funding a program off tobacco taxes, have to be acquired through other means.

The only two options available for the federal government would be to cut funding other programs or increase income taxes.

Because government spending in dollars never decreases, government leaders will push for a tax increase.

Our taxes have a profound effect on the world markets in our own backyard.

Countries like Honduras, Nicaragua and the Dominican Republic have established large tobacco farms strictly for the production of cigars to be sent to the United States because of its trade embargo with Cuba.

A $10 import tax on each foreign cigar would create a sharp decrease in the demand for foreign tobacco.

The abundant supply mixed with a decrease in demand for tobacco could cause terrible damage to already struggling foreign markets in Latin America.

Unfortunately, because of our financial connections with Latin American countries, we would be forced to send aid packages to keep our markets secure as well.

In the hopes of gaining popularity, Republicans and Democrats are playing a dangerous game of ignoring the man behind the curtain when promising to provide "free" health insurance.

Instead of using diversionary tactics to hide the sources of funding and their effects, we should start asking U.S. citizens if they feel comfortable paying for their neighbors' health care when they have their own families to worry about.

Public humiliation most effective form of punishment

Since the beginning of time, humans have relied on the positive encouragement of their peers.

There are entire industries created for the sole purpose of bettering oneself in the public eye, so it only seems obvious that some legal punishments would best be resolved through public humiliation.

Beginning in the colonial ages, humiliation has been served as punishment for various crimes.

Several examples are in classic novels like, "The Scarlet Letter" and "The Crucible."

While the crimes are not punishable in current times, the fact remains the same. I doubt either party ever went on to have illegitimate children or do anything that resembled witchcraft again.

Governmental officials in Thailand recently modified the practice of humiliation as a form of punishment.

In Bangkok, police officers caught committing petty misdemeanors now will be forced by the police administration to wear a hot pink "Hello Kitty" armband around their biceps for the remainder of the day after committing such a crime.

Offenses deemed worthy of this form of punishment range from littering to parking in a prohibited area or arriving late to work.

According to CNN, the Thai government said it is having problems controlling the number of petty offenses made by police officers.

This was their way of combating this problem.

The humiliation received in a workplace environment is nowhere near as effective as public humiliation; nevertheless, the officers are not required to wear them in public. By keeping the officers in the station, the act loses effectiveness.

Under the UN Charter, public humiliation has been deemed cruel and unusual punishment, but this ruling needs to be overturned.

Recently the American public has witnessed the DUI arrests of Nicole Richie, Paris Hilton and Lindsay Lohan.

While this is generally a common offense occurring more often than we realize, the situation was blown into a much bigger and more public ordeal by the American media.

The lesson was driven home much more effectively through the constant repetition of their drunken mistakes over the World Wide Web, and through newspapers, television and radio.

Recently senior tight end Rashaad Norwood was featured in several news outlets because of his multiple arrests.

Student athletes are celebrities on campus. If Norwood's name had not been well known on campus prior to his arrests, this situation may have gone relatively unnoticed.

No matter the crime, the punishment involved is humiliating especially to public figures.

But how much more intimidated would the common person be if everyone could expect to be broadcast like celebrities and well-known figures?

College students personally display their lives over many Internet outlets like Facebook.com, and we generally agree it is appropriate to display the personal information of sex offenders and violent criminals over a public-service Web site.

Obviously, we are well on our way to making this a socially acceptable idea.

Over the past 20 years, according to the annual state expenditure reports, the Kansas Department of Corrections has increased spending from $60 million to $264 million, while the prison population has increased by 20 percent.

By implementing public humiliation as a way of solving small offenses, space would open up in state prisons that people who have committed minor misdemeanors.

This social action potentially could lessen the load on jails and lower taxpayer contributions to incarceration facilities.

FreshWOMEN introduces new K-State

By Ali Johnson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Delta Sigma Theta's sixth-annual FreshWOMEN program for minority women new to campus will take place Sunday afternoon at the Little Theater in K-State Student Union.

This year's theme is "Avenues to Success," and women who participate will learn of the opportunities available to them on campus, said Lecretia Morrison, senior in architecture and Delta Sigma Theta's journalist and historian.

"This program was implemented to assist female minority students with adjustment and feeling more welcome and at home," Morrison said.

The program will introduce new female students to different organizations, programs and opportunities on campus they can get involved in.

"When you are in a totally different environment, things can seem very dominating at first glance," Morrison said. "This program just reinforces what services the university has to offer."

FreshWOMEN will provide a casual atmosphere where women can relax and listen to others talk about anything from residence-hall experiences to the best way to pull an all-nighter, Morrison said.

"We want to be real with the ladies about everything and sort of provide another upperclassman student perspective, in addition to what they have already heard," Morrison said.

Many organizations and businesses will be at the orientation, which will cover a variety of the resources K-State has to offer.

Information on opportunities for greek involvement, academic help, financial aid, jobs and career services also will be available.

"What makes this program so great is the opportunity to see something different from the minority perspective," said Tamara Taylor, senior in graphic design and Delta Sigma Theta program and development chair.

While Delta Sigma Theta focuses on the minority community, all women are welcome at the FreshWOMEN orientation. There are no additional informational meetings scheduled after the orientation, but contact information and brochures will be available for those who might have questions later on.

"This program is about women and the experiences they will face," said Amber Foust, senior in architectural engineering and chapter president. "We try to target the minority population, but this orientation is for all who are interested."

Barbecue to give students chance to network with

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students of all backgrounds have the opportunity to network with K-State multicultural organizations at the Black Student Union's welcome-back barbecue Saturday afternoon.

BSU's welcome-back barbecue has a more than 10-year tradition at K-State, said Bryon Williams, BSU president and senior in economics.

About 300 students are expected to attend the barbecue, and while the barbecue is open to all students, Williams said it is targeted at incoming freshmen and transfer students.

"It's a good way to meet and greet people," he said.

"It's also a good way to meet new faces and get connected with students."

BSU will offer free raffles, burgers, hot dogs and drinks at the barbecue, as well as information tables about multicultural and greek organizations.

More than 10 multicultural organizations will be represented at the barbecue.

During his time at K-State, Williams said he has been involved with BSU, Alpha Phi Alpha and Workers of Wisdom. Within his multicultural organizations, Williams said he received mentorship and guidance from the upperclassmen.

"They made sure I was going to class and actually checked up on me and showed me the way to go into college," he said. "It kept me focused in that aspect."

"I don't think I'd still be in school if I wasn't involved in the organizations that really kept me moving and focused."

While she has been a BSU member for several years, Deborah Muhwezi, BSU vice president, said this will be her first BSU barbecue. Muhwezi, junior in broadcast journalism, said the barbecue is an easy way for new students to meet new people.

"I remember I was really confused and didn't know who to talk to," she said. "This is a quick, easy, fun way to talk with people and get free food."

"A lot of incoming freshmen are unsure of who to talk with, but there will be a lot of different multicultural organizations that they can mingle with and get connected with."

Abdulrasheed Yahaya, sophomore in computer science, attended last year's barbecue, which he said allowed him to network with upperclassmen and faculty members.

As BSU's Big 12 head delegate, Yahaya said he has traveled across the Big 12 Conference in his leadership role.

"BSU has been the greatest experience I've had at Kansas State University," Yahaya said. "It taught me that striving toward a leadership role at such a young age can be beneficial in developing myself as a young leader."

Do you remember what happened last volleyball season?

I'm trying to forget.

The Wildcats marked their worst-ever Big 12 Conference finish. They started the season with an 8-2 record but then went just 4-16 in the Big 12, placing them second to last in the conference.

So why, you ask, did your beloved volleyball team disappoint?

In general, poor performances should be blamed on either coaches or players. Fortunately for coach Suzie Fritz, she already has proven she can be successful. K-State is one of three programs ever to win a Big 12 title, and last season was Fritz's first losing campaign.

The current players don't have the luxury of a good history like Fritz.

The best part about last year's players was that they were hard-working and excited. The worst part about last year's squad was that they were injured and excitable.

Junior outside hitter Rita Liliom injured her knee before the 2006 season, leaving a hole in the Wildcats' lineup.

Diving in was senior Angie Lastra, who moved to outside hitter from her natural position of libero.

During Lastra's stay at outside hitter, she gained valuable experience and became a team leader. It was natural for the rest of the Wildcats to follow Lastra when they watched her 5-foot-6 frame fly above the net time and time again for kills.

By the end of the 2006 season, Lastra had proved one thing to me. She has more talent per inch than anyone in the Big 12, and I think coach Suzie Fritz agrees.

"There is nobody better than Angie Lastra," Fritz said. "She makes plays that people just don't make."

This year, Lastra will be back where she belongs, anchoring K-State's backline defense from her natural libero position.

The Wildcats only graduated one senior in 2006, outside hitter Sandy Werner. With just one senior, the Wildcats had young, inexperienced leadership. They couldn't pull out the close matches, going 0-5 in five-game matches.

But luckily for everyone in the K-State world, the squad's young leadership is now mature leadership.

"Since 2003, I think these are the strongest leaders we've had," Fritz said.

There's more good news: Fritz landed a Russian transfer named Natalya Korobkova in the offseason. She is a 6-foot-3 junior who happens to be the preseason selection for Big 12 Newcomer of the Year. I've only seen her play once, but I already predict she will lead the Wildcats in kills.

Believe me, your 2007 team will not disappoint.

Wildcats receive 1st new football jerseys in 18 years

By Ryne Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In his second year, Ron Prince is still making his mark on K-State football. This time it is with new jerseys.

Gone are the two stripes on each shoulder. Instead, the new jerseys feature a tri-colored rectangle underneath the player's number. K-State also added the school name above the number on the front of the jerseys.

But the new jerseys are more than a fashion statement. They're designed to provide a more snug fit around the players' shoulder pads and body, which could provide benefits on the field.

"They are a little different material, which fits a lot tighter to you so it will be harder for the defense to grab you," senior Jordy Nelson said. "Hopefully we look good in them."

K-State accumulated 143 wins with the old jerseys, which were introduced in former coach Bill Snyder's first season. After 18 years with the old jerseys, Nelson said the K-State players were ready for a change.

"I think everyone is excited for (the new jerseys)," Nelson said. "Some people were getting tired of the old stuff."

It is always good getting new stuff. It is like getting new clothes. These "new clothes" give K-

State a new, updated look. The Wildcats will debut the new jerseys against Auburn on Sept. 1, a game that will be televised nationally on ESPN.

Senior Marcus Watts had a bit of advice to potential recruits who might tune in for the Auburn game.

"If (jerseys) are the reason why a kid is going to go somewhere, then that is the wrong reason," he said. "But we will go out and represent them - that's for sure."

Fritz sets this year's goals high after 2006-07 losing season

By Joel Jellison
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Last week, K-State volleyball coach Suzie Fritz said her goals for the season are 20 wins, a top-three league finish and a trip to the NCAA Tournament.

In short, she wants to have the kind of season Cal Poly had a year ago.

The Mustangs, K-State's opponent in today's season opener, return seven starters from a team that finished 23-6 and advanced to the second round of the NCAA Tournament last season.

K-State will face the 14th-ranked Cal Poly squad at 5 p.m. today in the opening round of the Shocker Classic at Charles Koch Arena in Wichita.

On Saturday, the Wildcats play North Texas at 11 a.m. before finishing tournament play against Wichita State at 7:30 p.m.

It's the third-straight time the Wildcats begin their season on the road. K-State has won its last four season-opening matches.

The tournament also will mark the debut of highly touted junior and Big 12 Preseason Newcomer of the Year Natalya Korobkova, who transferred to K-State from Siberian State Technical University.

It also will feature the return of junior Rita Liliom, who missed all of last season after injuring her left knee during the Purple and White Scrimmage.

Junior outside hitter Jenny Jantsch spikes the ball past two blockers during the scrimmage Saturday. K-State will open the new season today against Cal Poly at the Shocker Classic in Wichita.

Meyer leaves K-State football team

STAFF REPORT

Sophomore offensive lineman Derek Meyer has left the K-State football program, interim sports information director Kenny Lannou confirmed Thursday.

Meyer, a 6-foot-6, 310-pound lineman from Campbell, Neb., appeared in the first five games last season before missing the rest of the year with an injury.

Meyer worked with K-State's first unit during training camp last fall and was expected to contend for playing time this season.

He is the second player to leave K-State this week. Following Saturday's open practice, coach Ron Prince announced that defensive tackle Alphonso Moran is no longer with the team.

K-State hurlers honored for summer-league performances

A pair of K-State pitchers garnered most valuable pitcher honors while playing for their respective summer league teams.

K-State's Brad Hutt was named a National Baseball Congress All-American and the tournament's most valuable pitcher at the conclusion of the 44-team NBC World Series in Wichita. Hutt played for the overall runner-up Hays Larks.

The product of Papillion, Neb., didn't allow a run and threw a complete-game shut-out against perennial power Seattle to earn his second tourney win.

Justin Murray was named the Pitcher of the Year while pitching in the Texas Collegiate League for the McKinney Marshals. Murray, a native of Manhattan, proved to be nearly untouchable as he tallied a 5-2 record with a miniscule 0.54 ERA while only allowing three earned runs.

The Wildcat hurler was dominant striking out 48 and allowing only eight walks in 50 innings of work. Murray led the TCL in ERA, wins (tied with three others), third in innings pitched and fourth in strikeouts.

Resident suggests opening dog park

By Dawn Murphy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students can no longer play Frisbee with their dogs in City Park or let them swim in the river because of the recent legislation passed by Congress, which forbids dog owners to let their animals off their leashes.

One Manhattan resident thinks she has found a solution to what is frustrating dog owners across town. She wants to build a dog park in Manhattan.

Lynne Rathbone, said the dog park is only in the phase of discussion with the city commission and the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department.

The total cost of building a dog park somewhere in Anenberg Park would cost about $71,700, with fencing accounting for $31,500 of the total cost, Rathbone said.

So far, she has raised about $10,000 of the money needed. She hopes to get the rest from foundations and from the city. She said people who do not have dogs do not understand a dog's behavior.

"What's a dangerous dog?" Rathbone said. "I have a Doberman that's a well-trained, friendly therapy dog."

"But because of the current dog legislation, she's classified as a dangerous dog."

"I think a dog park is a great idea, not only because it gives the dogs a chance for some exercise and socialization, but also because it would bring a great spectrum of people there."

Rathbone said most cities surrounding Manhattan have dog parks and their success rates are high.

"Lawrence was able to lower dog aggression rates by about 50 percent by adopting a non-breed specific and anti-tethering law," she said. "I think that's what we need here in Manhattan."

Lynn Schumacher, shelter control supervisor for the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department, said the most important thing is that dog park users monitor what is going on at all times.

"It needs to be managed properly or it could turn into a nightmare," Schumacher said.

Only one or two animal control officers from the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department are on duty most days, and they cover a large area in and around Manhattan, she said.

"It is not like we could respond quickly if a fight broke out between dogs at the dog park," Schumacher said. "They have had problems at other dog parks of bigger dogs killing the smaller ones."

Both Chad Geri, third-year student in veterinarian medicine, and Kara Rogers, second-year student in veterinary medicine, are in favor of the idea of a dog park. Geri said he thinks the socialization will be good for dogs, and Rogers said she thinks it would take away the energy from dogs that would otherwise be utilized during aggressive behavior.

"Most dogs are very social generally, so I think a dog park would be a good social environ-

DOG PARK RULES

These are several rules required at the Topeka dog park that also would work for Manhattan.

1. No dangerous dogs with violations allowed.
2. No children less than 12 years old allowed unless occupied by a parent.
3. No more than three dogs per person.
4. No pregnant or lactating dogs.
5. A dog must be on a leash coming into the park.
6. An owner must watch the dog at all times.
7. An owner must pick up after their dog.
8. The small dogs (20 pounds or less) should be separated from large dogs (more than 20 pounds).
9. Each dog must be licensed and have proof of shots before entering dog park.
10. No dogs less than 4 years of age.

ment for them," Geri said.

Rogers said it is unfortunate that the dogs that need the most socialization are the ones that get it the least.

"If an owner consistently leaves their dog tied up or confined all day, that dog is going to be resentful and bored," Rogers said. "The dog gets all this pent-up energy, so then the dog will run out and act aggressively to the first thing it sees as a response."

Rogers said if dog owners could prove they were good owners of their dog and raised them to be properly socialized dogs, no longer would need to be any dog legislation in the city and the commission could do away with the dog ordinance.

Part-time job fair offers volunteer, paid opportunities for students

By Erin Fisher
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Five rows of tables filled the ballroom of the K-State Student Union during the Part-Time Opportunities Fair on Thursday.

Several students perused the tables and applied for jobs, while others picked up pamphlets for more information.

"I came to get a job for extra spending cash," said Ben Schoenberger, sophomore in business administration.

The fair was a new event for several students, but not for Schoenberger. "I knew about it from last year," he said.

More than 300 students and 60 businesses attended the fair, said LaToya Farris, Career and Employment Services assistant director.

After registering with CES, students entered the fair and spoke with local businesses. Many volunteer jobs were available, as well as paid opportunities. Several business representatives said they had a need for part-time workers in the Manhattan community.

"We have a huge need for people," said Sheri Albright, Comfort Keepers marketing director. "It's a good opportunity for K-State students."

Comfort Keepers provides non-medical in-home care for the elderly and also has houses in the Manhattan community, Albright said.

"We have overnight hours," she said. "We can work around their schedules."

Students on the go did not have time to check out each table.

"I came to apply at Big Lakes, and I was just going to stop by," said Claire Leet, junior in life sciences.

Big Lakes Developmental Center provides services for people with developmental disabilities.

"We are looking for kind, compassionate workers," said Lugen Lutz, Big Lakes human resources director.

Habitat for Humanity had representation at the event.

Margaret Stone, Habitat for Humanity executive director, said the organization was looking for volunteers and one intern to manage its retail store.

The Union had a table set up at the part-time opportunities fair because of open positions, said Paula Connors, Union human resources specialist.

"It's also good exposure for the (Caribou Coffee) ribbon cutting," Connors said.

Students check out employment options at the Part-Time Opportunities Fair on Thursday in the K-State Student Union. More than 300 students and 60 businesses attended the fair.

Top 5 classic drinking games require few materials, easy to learn

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With the end of the first week of classes coming to a close, the first weekend of the semester is upon us – and this means parties.

At social events, guests can play drinking games in which players on the losing end, who are old enough to consume alcohol, take a drink.

One of the best parts of drinking games is the minimal amount of equipment needed to play the game.

The most important thing to remember when playing any drinking game is to know when to stop drinking. Nothing stops the party like a trip to the emergency room, so be smart. Stop drinking when you've had enough.

It's also important to remember when playing any drinking game that the house makes the rules. No matter who you are, the party hosts declare the rules of the game.

While there are literally thousands of drinking games, included is a list of the five most popular on campus.

BEER PONG

Beer pong, or Beirut as called by some, is arguably the most popular non-card game played at parties. Materials needed to play this game are anywhere from 6 to 10 plastic cups, depending on house rules, and several ping-pong balls.

Cups are arranged in a pyramid at opposing ends of the table, and two teams have two attempts to throw the ping-pong balls into the cups at the other side of the table.

MOOSE

Another group game called Moose can bring hours of enjoyment to any party.

In this game, all that is needed is an empty ice tray, a glass and a quarter. A beverage is poured into the glass, and the ice tray is leaned against the glass. Players take turns trying to bounce their quarters into the ice tray.

The number of drinks taken depends on which side of the tray the quarter bounces into. If the quarter bounces into the right side of the tray, the player hands out that number of drinks.

For example, if the quarter lands in the right side in the fifth section, the player who bounced the quarter gives five drinks to those sitting around the circle.

If the quarter bounces into the left side of the tray, the bouncer must take that number of drinks.

The most exciting element of the game is when the quarter is bounced into the glass in the middle. As soon as the quarter lands, all around the table must make moose horns with their hands and shout "moose." The last person to do so must drink what is in the cup.

POLISH HOCKEY

Another popular game calls for two PVC pipes that are hammered into the ground with a bottle placed on top of each pipe. Polish hockey is an easy-to-construct group game.

Standing at opposite ends of the yard, the opposing team throws a Frisbee at the other bottle in an attempt to knock it to the ground. See house rules regarding points and length between the two pipes.

FLIPPIE CUP

Flippie cup, one of the easiest games to play, also allows many people to play at one time. In this game, two teams line up on separate sides of the table with about an inch of beverage filling their cups.

Beginning with the first player on each side, contestants must drink what is in their cup, put the cup back on the table and flick the bottom of the cup with their finger until it lands upside down.

It's a race to the end and once every person in the line has completed their flip, the last person in line immediately begins the process again, going in the opposite direction.

This fast-paced game is sure to be a hit and can also lead to some raucous evenings.

MAKE YOUR OWN

A fun way to personalize any drinking game you play is to get a copy of your favorite CD or movie.

Before the start of the song or movie, think of a drinking action. For example, if the chosen song was "I Wanna Rock'n'roll All Night" by Kiss, one group takes a drink when they sing "rock and roll," and the other group drinks when they say "all night."

This is a simple way to make any song or movie more interesting as well as make some new friends during a night on the town.

Also, partygoers can make modifications to any known drinking game to personalize typical drinking games.

Recruitment has many ups, downs

The door opened, and several girls stepped out, appearing flawless in straight lines and wearing bright smiles. A younger group of girls stands on the curb, intimidated and apprehensive.

ASHLEY FREY

The formal sorority recruitment process finished just last week.

The girls who experienced recruitment were referred to as potential new members (PNMs). Last week was extremely important to those girls, because they were trying to pick the house that was right for them. A house in which the girls, who they do not know yet, will soon become their closest friends – perhaps even their bridesmaids.

Last year, I went through recruitment and joined a house, and I am now finished with my year as a recruit. The process was long, but not nearly as stressful as when I was first looking for a house to join.

Sorority recruitment can be stressful for both sides of the process. Girls going through recruitment are working to sell themselves to a house, while the girls in the sorority are trying to promote their house in order to get the best possible group of recruits.

The positive and negative aspects of recruitment blend together to create one very significant week in the world of greek life.

One positive aspect of formal recruitment includes the opportunity to meet many new people. For example, when the PNMs go through recruitment, they are placed in a residence hall with more than 20 other girls. This forced the girls to branch out and make new friends.

PNMs get the chance to tour every house. During the week of recruitment, they visit all 11 sorority houses. Many go on tours to see the entire sorority house. This allows them to visualize what kind of environment they might live in for the next few years.

Despite these positives, there are still negative aspects to formal recruitment.

It is typically an entire week of the same conversation over and over again, including questions likely "What is your major?" and "Where are you from?" Imagine how stressful it could be to base your future on a few superficial conversations.

Part of the reason the conversations are so repetitive has to do with restrictions placed on what can be discussed: no booze, no boys, etc. Yes, I can understand that to an extent, but it is difficult to make any sort of decision on either side of recruitment based on generally forced, fake conversation.

However, even on the recruiting side I have found positive aspects. I spent my days – from 9 a.m. to 9 p.m. or later – working with the girls in my house. I got to know girls I barely knew prior to the last few weeks. It makes me realize that I am in the right house, and I love all the girls in it.

This photo of the president's house was taken in 1930, seven years after it was built.

President's home about 84 years old

This is the first installment of a new feature in the paper that sets out to answer the questions students want to know about the K-State and Manhattan communities. Questions concerning historical information, news that was not covered or anything you want to know are welcomed. Please e-mail questions to collegian@ksu.edu.

How old is the president's house?

The president's house was constructed in 1923. Other than the occasional renovation and campus growth around it, the house's appearance has not changed much since its construction. The three-story, 3,500-square foot house originally was constructed for $31,000, mostly without the aid of outside contractors. It has housed six different presidents. The president's family has entertained and housed several famous figures, including Landon Lecturers and other guests like author Truman Capote. The house has been used for a variety of other purposes in the past, like a classroom and a location for a reception party for graduating seniors. Two presidents' houses existed in the late 1800s. One was located where Holton Hall is now, and the next burned down after it was struck by lightning.

really wanted it to be when school was back in session."

Caribou Coffee replaced Chillie Willie's Ice Cream Parlor on the second floor of the Union. Griffin said Chillie Willie's was too quiet for the atmosphere of the Union and called Caribou Coffee the "living room of campus."

She said students and faculty support the venues in the Union and that she was happy to see the student involvement.

"If you come here on a daily basis, you see that," she said. "For me, for students to show up and take part spoke volumes."

Many think having a coffee shop in the Union is beneficial.

"It's nice to have an actual, good chain coffee place here in the Union," said Ian Hartsig, junior in architectural engineering. "People can come in before and after class. Obviously the convenience of being in the Union is really nice."

Danielle Theiss-White, general reference coordinator at Hale Library, said she came to K-State from another university that had a Caribou Coffee near its campus, and she regularly goes to the shop in the Union.

Theiss-White said she does not drink coffee but drinks the shop's chai and other teas.

"They're really accommodating if you want something that's not on the menu, which is really nice," she said.

The Union, Caribou Coffee and Chartwells all cosponsored the ribbon-cutting event and put out promotional flyers, sent invitations and provided the free travel mugs, granola bars and coffee.

Several distinguished members of the community also attended the event, including Rep. Sydney Carlin, D-Manhattan, and Manhattan Chamber of Commerce members.

circumstances. "I'd worry about addiction rates of prescription painkillers and marijuana. If pills are less addictive in the long run, then stick with what works."

According to the release from the latest KSCCC press conference, mainstream medical organizations like the American Academy of Family Physicians, the American Public Health Association and the American Nurses Association all support the supervised use of medicinal marijuana.

Paul Morrison, current attorney general, refuses to share his personal opinion on the matter.

Despite ever-changing political atmospheres and medical breakthroughs, some Kansans are starting to consider the bowl half empty.

"It could take a century for medical marijuana to be accepted by the majority," said Larry Moeller, a medical doctor at Lafene Health Center.

"There are intelligent, open-minded people who can promote this campaign, but if it doesn't happen in this lifetime, I don't think it'll ever happen."

that's why we're trying to raise money," Buckmiller said. "It's also one of the most fun sports I've ever played, so it's worth the money."

Several new organizations also had their first Activities Carnival experience Thursday night. Fruit of the Fight, an organization with three goals dedicated to healthy lifestyles, had a booth featuring plastic models of five pounds of fat compared to five pounds of muscle.

Fruit of the Fight president Kacey Provenzano said she received the inspiration for the organization after being a national finalist for the Susan G. Komen Breast Cancer Foundation College Scholarship Award Program in 2005. Provenzano, junior in nutritional sciences and pre-medicine, received permission to use the phrase "fruit of the fight" after a guest speaker used it at the scholarship banquet.

Fruit of the Fight is an organization open to all academic majors, Provenzano said. About 30 members participate in educational lectures and presentations about preventative health care and healthy lifestyles. With a team of eight people, the organization also raised about $1,300 for Relay for Life last spring.

The Office of Student Activities sponsored the activities carnival on three levels of the Union, while the Union Program Council also sponsored its "Shrek"-themed expo in the Union Courtyard and Bosco Student Plaza.

Meghan Newman, UPC Community Committee co-chair, said a "Shrek" theme was chosen since the third movie came out this summer. Different decorations like a castle and swamp were featured in the "Getting Involved is Never Far Far Away" theme.

The expo, which attracted about 4,000 students, was a chance for freshmen to hang out with friends and participate in free activities, Newman said. Jousting, "Shrek" movie-poster photographs and a 60-second caricature artist were among the expo activities.

"I think for UPC, this is a strong event to kick off the year," she said.

Newman said she encourages students to become involved in organizations and make a contribution to the university.

"I think that getting involved in an organization helps you stay connected with the campus," she said.

Facebook group made false assumption with released sketch

By Bridgette A. West
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A sketch of a man was posted Friday on a Facebook group site accusing him of being the serial rapist.

The group on Facebook—called “Catch Him 2007: We Need Your Help!”—asserted that the sketch released to the press Friday was the man sought for a series of rapes in Manhattan.

“The sketch is of someone that was in the Aggieville business area, and we would like to talk to him to see who he is or what he was doing, but no indication was ever made by the RCPD that this individual was the suspected rapist,” said Det. Carla Swartz of the Riley County Police Department.

The group changed details on its description, recent news and wall sections after Swartz posted a statement on the group’s wall.

Before these changes were made, group members made allegations that an individual on Facebook looked like the man in the sketch, which led to the posting of his name and picture next to the sketch for comparison.

While this individual might have resembled the sketch, Swartz said, sketches are not always perfect representations because they are based on descriptions given to a sketch artist.

“What I don’t want is people thinking this is the rapist and exclude other individuals that may appear suspicious,”

Swartz said.

Darcy Hamilton, senior in mass communications and member of Wildcats Against Rape, said Facebook is useful for awareness purposes but that people should leave certain aspects of the investigation to the police.

“If you do suspect someone, then call the RCPD; don’t discuss it on Facebook. That only spreads misinformation,” Hamilton said.

“If there is information to be given, then the police will provide it. Otherwise, you’re just interfering with the case.”

The police have investigated suspicious activity and possible breaking and entering reported by individuals, and the case remains open, Swartz said.

“A lot of work has gone into this active case for the past seven years, and the RCPD has utilized every resource it can,” Swartz said.

A concerned citizen’s best option is to refer to police information on issues like the alleged rapist, because students easily can cross the legal grounds of libel or harm the reputation of someone who is accused in a public forum, Swartz said.

“The rules of libel would operate the same for Facebook as it would for anything that got published,” said Todd Simon, professor of journalism and mass communications.

“If the person accused of the crime could meet the libel tests, he could bring a successful action against the individuals that posted his personal information and picture as well as the social network or blog.”

PERSON OF INTEREST

Police released this sketch of a male subject who was seen in the Aggieville area at approximately 2:30 a.m. on Tuesday, Aug. 7, 2007. He was seen wearing a ball cap, a red short-sleeved shirt, tan pants, a hoop earring in his left upper ear and carrying a backpack. If anyone has information regarding the identity and/or whereabouts of this man, please contact Det. Darla King at the Riley County Police Department at (785) 537-2112, ext. 3029, or call Manhattan/Riley County Crimestoppers anonymously at 1 (800) 222-8477. To get involved with W.A.R. —Wildcats Against Rape—e-mail Mary Todd at mtodd@ksu.edu.

Simon said to prove libel, the defendant must first prove the allegations were false. Then, the defendant must prove defamation of character and damage to the reputation or character, in order to receive monetary compensation.

“This is a very emotional crime, and I know people are frustrated, but misinformation being posted will not help,” Swartz said.

“We would encourage anybody that has experienced something suspicious or has seen someone suspicious to call the police department directly.”

Contest raises funds for Greensburg relief

By Nicholas Birdsong
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The third-annual U-turn festival featured free music and an ice-cream-making contest Saturday afternoon in Manhattan City Park.

The Real Life Church sponsored the event, which raised money for victims of the tornado in Greensburg, Kan., on May 4.

“It’s important to be able to rally around something,” said Lance Stafford, event organizer. “The disaster really hit home for some people.”

This year’s events began with the ice-cream-making contest.

The winner for the tastiest homemade ice cream received a rather tasty treat themselves.

“The winner of the contest will receive free Cold Stone ice cream for a year,” said Stafford.

He said the contest was largely sponsored by Cold Stone Creamery.

Frozen treats were judged by a panel of two people from Cold Stone Creamery, Stafford said.

Michael and Dae-dra Lowry won the contest with their peach-flavored ice cream.

“We estimate (we raised) over $300 from the ice cream competition,” Stafford said.

After the ice-cream competition came to a close, the musical portion of the festival began.

Six different bands, all hailing from Kansas, performed Saturday.

Some spectators said they thought the local flavor was a positive addition to the ice-cream-making event.

“It’s been great, especially for the bands,” said Alecia Stuchlik, senior in anthropology. “It is essential to get the word out.”

Luckily the day’s weather was nearly perfect for the event, Stafford said, and that contributed to the number of spectators who turned out for the show.

“There was a steady flow throughout the evening,” Stafford said. “There was about 200-300 people at one point.”

There were people in the crowd of all ages, and many seemed to enjoy the ice cream and music event.

“It was a really nice day, hanging out in the park,” said Ethan Walker, junior in biology.

Last year the concert raised money for the Hope Ranch.

According to the Hope Ranch Web site, the Hope Ranch is an organization that rescues girls from destructive lifestyles to heal them in a caring Christian environment.

2nd-annual After Hours pep rally features new basketball head coach, athletes

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

Frank Martin, K-State men’s basketball coach, speaks to guests at After Hours on Friday evening in the K-State Student Union Courtyard. Most of the athletes introduced themselves to fans at the event.

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A hush of silence swept the K-State Student Union Courtyard as first-year head basketball coach Frank Martin took the stage Friday night.

Martin, along with his coaching staff and the men’s basketball team, addressed about 400 people at Union Program Council’s second-annual After Hours pep rally.

“I can’t tell you how much we need you students at the games now,” Martin said. “It gives us tremendous energy from the bench to see you guys.”

Brad Underwood, assistant coach, also said audience members have the chance to add to K-State men’s basketball history.

“With this group of guys right here, this is the most talented group of basketball players in Kansas State history,” Underwood said. “This’ll be something special you’ll remember 10-15 years from now. When this team is in the Final Four, I expect everyone to be there.”

Most of K-State’s varsity teams were represented at the pep rally, as well as the K-State Marching Band and cheer squad. The pep rally took place inside for the second time because of inclement weather. UPC also was unable to have the rock-wall and dunk-tank activities at the event, said Trista Brown, UPC After Hours committee co-chair.

UPC’s pep rally was different from others since it took place at the Union and most of the varsity sports had representation, said Brown, senior in management. UPC members started planning the event in April and worked on it throughout the summer, Brown said.

“I’ve enjoyed all of the players and getting to know them better,” she said. “I love it when the band plays in general, so that was exciting for me.”

UPC members raffled off sports-affiliated prizes between team introductions, and sports team members also tossed out K-State clothing to audience members.

Dead Girls Ruin Everything performed a live set between 9:30 and 10:30, which ended the four-hour pep rally.

Sierra Smith, freshman in political science, said she attended the pep rally in support of her friend and K-State cheerleader, Jennifer Agwu. Smith said she plans to attend future After Hours events during the semester.

“It keeps students out of trouble,” Smith said. “It gives them something entertaining to do without alcohol, and you get to hang out with your friends.”

Beth Bailey, Union assistant director, said a previous UPC graduate assistant

TODAY 1883: Explosion of Krakatau volcano

The most powerful volcanic eruption in recorded history occurred on Krakatau (also called Krakatoa), a small, uninhabited volcanic island located west of Sumatra in Indonesia, on this day in 1883.

Heard 3,000 miles away, the explosions threw five cubic miles of earth 50 miles into the air, created 120-foot tsunamis and killed 36,000 people. Krakatau exhibited its first stirrings in more than 200 years on May 20, 1883. A German warship passing by reported a seven-mile high cloud of ash and dust over Krakatau.

For the next two months, commercial liners and natives on nearby Java and Sumatra witnessed similar explosions.

With little or no idea of the impending catastrophe, the local inhabitants greeted the volcanic activity with festive excitement, though soon after, they were surprised with the death of more than 36,000 people.

The K-State men's club soccer tryouts at Memorial Stadium will be 6:30-8 tonight and 8-9:30 p.m. Tuesday. Send questions to jpark13@ksu.edu.

K-State Interfraternity Council will meet 5-9 p.m. Sunday in Bosco Plaza. There will be an information booth in the Union Monday through Friday. Send questions to bpuderba@ksu.edu.

The planner is the Collegian's campus bulletin board service. Items in the calendar can be published up to three times. Items might not appear because of space constraints but are guaranteed to appear on the day of the activity. To place an item in the Campus Calendar, stop by Kedzie 116 and fill out a form or e-mail the news editor at collegian@pub.ksu.edu by 11 a.m. two days before it is to run.

THIS WEEK

A look at events that occurred during this week in history, other bizarre holidays, happenings

TUESDAY Marshmallow Toasting Day

Perhaps it is just as well that there are no big holidays to compete with National Marshmallow Toasting Day. After all, how could any holiday compare with this day?

Enjoy today with a campfire or bonfire, toasting a big, sweet marshmallow ... or two or three.

Summer would not be the same without a fire and this great campfire treat. Toast a marshmallow and forget everything else.

But don't forget to make a few S'mores with two squares of graham cracker, one or two marshmallows, and a square of chocolate.

WEDNESDAY 1885: Motorcycle patented

The world's first motorcycle, made by Gottlieb Daimler, was patented on this day.

The two-wheeled vehicle gained immense popularity after 1910, when it was used heavily by all branches of the armed forces during World War I.

The motorcycle's popularity lagged during the Great Depression but made a comeback with a vengeance after World War II and remains popular today. Sometimes associated with a rebellious image, the vehicle often is used for high-speed touring and sport competitions.

THURSDAY 1966: China agrees to provide economic, technical aid to North Vietnam

Hanoi Radio announces that Deputy Premier Le Thanh Nghi signed an agreement with Peking whereby the People's Republic of China will provide additional economic and technical aid to North Vietnam. China already had supported communists in Vietnam since the war against the French.

FRIDAY 1997: Princess Diana dies from car crash

Diana, Princess of Wales, dies in Paris' Pitie-Saipetiere Hospital after suffering massive chest injuries in an early morning car accident. Her companion, Dodi Fayed, was killed instantly in the 12:25 a.m. crash, as was driver Henri Paul, who was drunk and lost control of the Mercedes in a highway underpass.

Paul was driving at excessive speeds in an attempt to escape paparazzi. Diana's bodyguard, Trevor Rees Jones, escaped with serious but nonfatal injuries. He was the only one wearing a seat belt.

SATURDAY Emma M. Nutt Day

Emma M. Nutt was the first woman telephone operator.

She started her job on Sept. 1, 1878. She said she loved the position, and worked as an operator for 33 years.

This special day celebrates the world of telephone operators. Today, the position has been eliminated and replaced by automation in telephone systems.

SUNDAY 1969: Release of 1st ATMs revolutionizes banking, replaces human tellers

On this day in 1969, America's first automatic teller machine makes its public debut, dispensing cash to customers at Chemical Bank in Rockville Center, N.Y. ATMs revolutionized the banking industry, eliminating the need to visit a bank to conduct basic financial transactions. By the 1980s, these machines had become widely popular and taken over many jobs.

Gloria Conner, senior in family studies and human services and vice president of Zeta Phi Beta Sorority Inc., talks with students at Delta Sigma Theta's FreshWOMEN orientation Sunday evening in the Little Theatre in the K-State Student Union

FreshWOMEN event focuses on welcoming new students

By Chyla Eugster
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sharene Lester had always wanted to pledge a sorority.

Lester, freshman in marketing, attended Delta Sigma Theta's FreshWOMEN Orientation Sunday in the Little Theatre in the K-State Student Union. She said she found the orientation helpful because it provided information about how to become more involved and get connected on campus.

"I really liked the Career and Employment (Services) presentation about searching for internships, and I'm so glad I came," she said. "I have also always wanted to pledge a sorority, and I learned a lot about them and the presentations they gave will help me choose one that fits me the best."

Delta Sigma Theta's fifth-annual FreshWOMEN Orientation informed minority women of the opportunities available as new or transfer students. Representatives from K-State organizations offered information to students about the community and the different multicultural events available. Organizations like the Black Student Union, Leisure Hall Tutoring Services and the Student Governing Association also attended the event.

Though all students receive similar information at summer freshman orientation, Lecretia Morrison, Delta Sigma Theta journalist/historian, said her sorority wanted to provide minority women with the chance to hear about the activities they could be a part of on a personal level.

"The program first started five years ago when we saw a need because of the amount of minority women on campus," Morrison, senior in architecture, said. "We wanted to make them feel more welcomed and give them a chance to ask questions and become involved on a deeper level."

Tamara Taylor, Delta Sigma Theta program chair, said she thought the program was a success because it offered valuable information about K-State to new students and made them feel welcome.

"We are trying to do our part in promoting diversity at K-State," said Taylor, senior in graphic design. "I think we made these women feel like they could get involved and be a part of something great."

Myra Gordon, associate provost of diversity and dual career development, said students should promote diversity at K-State.

"Everybody has a job in diversity because everybody wants K-State to be more diverse," Gordon said. "Employers are looking to diversify their workplaces, so it is good for the community as a whole to promote diversity. We must plan for what we want to have happen, and at K-State we are working hard to get there."

BSU barbecue offers networking options for multicultural students

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Black Student Union celebrated its first fully sponsored welcome-back barbecue Saturday afternoon in front of the Strong Complex.

While the barbecue has taken place at K-State for more than 10 years, BSU had full sponsorship for its barbecue this year. Cargill, a privately owned international provider of food, agricultural and risk-management products, sponsored the event. Blue Valley School District, located in Leawood, Kan., also donated $200 to BSU for the barbecue.

It was the first time school district representatives attended the barbecue to recruit minority educators, said Blue Valley School District Spanish teacher Robin Richardson.

Richardson said the district added one elementary school and high school this year and continues to expand. She also said the community, which is predominately white, has seen an increase in its minority population.

"Blue Valley realized the face of the community is changing," she said. "With that, they know if the face of the community is changing, more diverse teachers are needed too."

Cargill representatives also discussed Cargill's career opportunities and its diversity efforts within the community. The company supports national minority organizations like Minorities in Agriculture, Natural Resources and Related Sciences (MANNRS) and also provides workshops and scholarships with other organizations, said Natasha Swayzer, Cargill campus recruiter.

Swayzer said Cargill representatives attended the barbecue to recruit minority students for internships and career opportunities.

"We generally recruit at the national conference, so we're trying to get better at the local level," she said.

Bryon Williams, BSU president, said about 200 people attended the annual event. Williams, junior in economics, said his first BSU event as a freshman was the welcome-back barbecue.

"It was one of the ways to meet a lot of people," he said. "I had already met a lot of freshmen in the residence halls, so it gave me the chance to meet a lot of upperclassmen and do some networking."

Williams said this year's barbecue was successful.

"I heard nothing but good things from the people who came out," he said.

BSU will have its first meeting of the semester at 7 p.m. Tuesday in Union 212. Students can join the organization anytime, and membership dues are $10 each year.

Williams said BSU will have an academic "push" this year in its goal for an all-organization 3.0 grade point average among members. Membership recruitment also is a goal.

Brittany Pennington, sophomore in computer engineering, said she is not active in any multicultural organizations, but that she planned to join several.

"It's important to meet new people and make new friends," she said.

Gallery talk features couple, their collection of Kansas artwork

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Husband and wife Bill Tsutsui and Marjorie Swann saw themselves as just passing through Kansas when they accepted teaching jobs at the University of Kansas.

Fifteen years later, the couple said their collection of artwork by Kansans covers "every flat surface in our house."

Tsutsui and Swann presented a gallery talk on their exhibition "Making Kansas Home: Selections from the Marjorie Swann and Bill Tsutsui Collection" at the Mariana Kistler Beach Museum of Art on Sunday afternoon.

The exhibition's title, "Making Kansas Home," describes the transition the couple has made during the last 15 years, Tsutsui said.

"In many ways, the Beach Museum is what inspired Marjorie and I to begin collecting Kansas art in the first place," Tsutsui said. "When we first came to Kansas, we saw ourselves as more or less just passing through."

"After a while, we realized we really liked Kansas. When we started to get into the artwork, we appreciated the landscape and the beauty and heritage of this state."

"Making Kansas Home" went on display at the museum June 1, and it included more than 40 pieces of Kansas paintings, woodcuts and pottery.

Instead of discussing specific exhibition pieces, Tsutsui and Swann presented a lecture about what makes a collection.

"A collection is a group of objects that have been selected, gathered together and separated from everyday use," Swann said.

"Everyday use" separates socks and artwork in their collection classifications, she said, which brought laughter from audience members.

The couple purchased their first piece of Kansas artwork in 1999 at a small gallery in Lawrence. Herschel Logan constructed "Monday Morning," a woodcut on paper, in 1934. The couple framed the piece and hung it in a guest bathroom.

In less than one year, the couple said they had collected more than 100 of Logan's woodcuts, which often portray Kansas during the Great Depression and Dust Bowl.

Tsutsui said he and Swann developed a "collecting bug" for Kansas artwork, and their collection is open-ended.

Swann is originally from Canada while Tsutsui is from Texas, but the couple said their Kansas art collection "has come to touch both ends of the spectrum."

Swann also said the Great Plains culture is similar to Canadian culture.

"It takes a while to get to know a Canadian, and I think it's that way with Kansans, too," Swann said.

Karen McCulloh, Friends of the Libraries director at Hale Library, said she enjoyed Tsutsui and Swann's explanation of collections.

"I think this is really important for people to see what two people with relatively modest incomes can collect," McCulloh said. "It shows that anybody can have an art collection — you just have to collect what you like."

HIT OR MISS

The editorial board selects Hit or Miss topics and writes them after a majority vote. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

HIT | THREE-DAY WEEKEND

It is an appropriate reward for surviving two full, grueling weeks of classes.

MISS | WEBMAIL

K-State's e-mail service was consistently unreliable during the first week of school and over the weekend. Weren't we supposed to switch to Gmail?

HIT | FREE CHIPOTLE BURRITOS

Chipotle gave free burritos to people who showed a K-State ID. Students might have had to wait in line for quite a while, but they did get a freshly made burrito with their choice of any of the ingredients normally offered.

MISS | CARELESS FACEBOOK USERS

People are starting groups about Manhattan's serial rapist without abiding by the First Amendment. How about some rights?

HIT | FIRST FOOTBALL GAME

It's not a home game, but it is a reason to get together with friends and watch. Students can look forward to a match-up against preseason 14th-ranked Auburn. Hey, it can happen ... remember Texas?

MISS | MINE OWNER'S BROKEN PROMISE

Bob Murray, co-owner of the Utah coal mine, promised the trapped miners' families he would get them out dead or alive at the beginning, and now he's backing out. We don't condemn his decision, but it's not right to make promises you can't keep.

THE ONION

Tourist never leaves space shuttle

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — Despite having never visited outer space before and being completely free from the everyday demands of work and gravity, space tourist Dick Knowles spent his entire 19-day, $7 million vacation holed up inside the space shuttle Atlantis, sources reported Monday.

An increasingly popular destination among dozens of American, Russian and Chinese travelers each year, space is quickly acquiring a reputation for its infinite number of attractions and sights.

However, according to friends and family members speaking for the first time since Knowles' trip in June, the 47-year-old billionaire investor never once ventured more than a few feet outside his oxygen-filled cabin.

"What's the point of training for months and traveling 3 million miles if you're just going to sit around some orbital craft all day?" friend Jeffrey Plotnick said. "For all he did, Dick might as well have stayed home in Texas."

"He didn't even visit the moon. Who goes to space and doesn't visit the moon?"

Knowles, who reportedly spent his first day in space recovering from "severe jet lag" and most of his second day trying to make contact with relatives back home, is believed to have seen only 9.23 x 10¹⁸ of what the Milky Way Galaxy alone has to offer during his interstellar stay.

Golfing partner Steven Margolin said he also was disappointed to learn about Knowles' trip.

"Do you know what he said his favorite part of the trip was? Gazing at the Earth," Margolin said. "Not going to Mars, or flying through an asteroid belt, or even checking out one of those black holes, but 'gazing at the Earth.' Way to broaden your horizons, pal."

—theonion.com

In 1962, the beehive hairstyle was at its peak in popularity. Luckily, the beehive hair along with platform shoes and acid washing all went out of style.

Chances are what seemed reasonable in 1962 is not so reasonable now, 45 years later. One prime example is the United States' embargo against Cuba.

Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama realized 1962 policies will not solve 21st-century problems. Last week, Obama criticized the Bush Administration for making it tougher for Cuban-Americans to visit loved ones in Cuba.

According to CBSnews.com, President Bush's 2004 additions to the embargo allow Cuban-Americans to visit the island no more than once every three years. Also, they can send only quarterly remittances of up to $300, as opposed to $3,000 a year and annual visits four years ago.

The idea of using our power to weaken a country and its people to create positive feelings toward us is the same logic President Bush uses when it comes to Iraq. We talk down on Cuba every chance we get and ban its products in the United States, yet we are surprised when the Cuban people have hostile views of Americans.

Obama wrote an op-ed piece for the Miami Herald shedding some light on the flaws of our current foreign policy toward Cuba.

"The primary means we have of encouraging positive change in Cuba today is to help the Cuban people become less dependent on the Castro regime in fundamental ways," Obama wrote.

Obama, along with his fellow Democrats, are not calling for an end to the embargo entirely, only the restrictions of Cuban-Americans.

According to USA Today, Gov. Bill Richardson agrees with Obama's position. Sen. Chris Dodd supports lifting all travel restrictions, and Rep. Dennis Kucinich opposes the embargo altogether.

It might be a while before Kucinich gets his way, but we must consider his reasoning. We do not trade with Cuba because of the regime and its communist government, yet our biggest trading partner has a communist government, not to mention multiple human-rights issues.

President Nixon had the foresight to open relations with China, because he saw opportunities there for the United States. Why can we not have a "Bush goes to Havana" moment?

Now is the perfect opportunity. Fidel is ailing, and if the United States starts now to gain the trust and support of the Cuban people, the transition from communism to democracy will be much easier.

Perhaps the embargo is a fashion from the '60s that still holds water today. But opportunity is knocking at the United States' door. We can gain an ally or keep an enemy. The question is: Will America answer the door, or will we blockade it?

OWEN KENNEDY

Book sales should not be Simpson's debt solution

If O.J. Simpson was innocent in 1995, he certainly seems guilty of whipping up media frenzy with the soon-to-be release of his novel, "If I Did It: Confessions of the Killer."

Simpson's book was set to be released last November but has been delayed from local bookshelves for a number of reasons — most notably its content.

In "If I Did It" Simpson describes how he would have murdered Ron Goldman and ex-wife Nicole Brown Simpson — a crime of which he was accused in the highly publicized U.S. criminal trial.

The trial was so sensational, according to the Nielsen Media Research reports, approximately 150 million viewers watched it on Oct. 3, 1995, when a California jury found Simpson innocent.

As the hype of O.J. Simpson began to resurface after the planned release of his book last year, Associated Press reports state Harper-Collins' publisher canceled the book due to public outrage.

In response, a Florida bankruptcy court awarded the rights of the book to the Goldman family this month, partially satisfying the unpaid $38 million civil judgment Simpson owes to the families.

Now with the 254-page book in its hands, the Goldman family has cleverly sketched the cold-stone cover of the book and added "Confessions of the Killer" to the title. In addition to Simpson's manuscript, the Goldman family added text to illustrate its side of the story.

Though the families have been grieving the deaths for 13 years, the Florida court had no right to pass on the book to those in mourning.

The families are likely to profit from this so-called tall-tale book of how Simpson would have committed the crime, and they do deserve the money owed them.

The families, however, should have a sense of pride and not let Simpson pay for his debts by making more of a mockery of the case and its proceedings.

The ethical questions don't stop in the courts but also include book retailers. Stores like Barnes & Noble have taken a teeter-totter stance on supporting the book release.

According to an Aug. 21 Washington Post article, spokespersons for the prime bookseller said the company does not intend to sell the books in stores, but it will sell through special order from its online Web site for interested customers.

Rival chain Borders Group Inc. released a statement saying it would release the book but not promote it. Borders also had planned to donate the profits to charity, but now with the book in the hands of the Goldman family, the company decided to reverse that decision.

While many don't hear the terms "business" and "ethics" in the same sentence, these booksellers should have taken a stance on the selling of the book in their stores. Instead, like any bad relationship, companies release statements saying they kind of do/don't/might/maybe/sorta believe it's great/good/bad/ugly. They should have had the guts to be a company with standards away from the money-grubbing madness.

Whether the release of the book makes killer sales, the courts and big businesses need to re-evaluate their values and take a stance in support of those who truly need it. While the victims' families might deserve the money owed them, Simpson should pay it back just like any other blue-collar American.

This country already has let Simpson get away with enough. His celebrity status shouldn't let him get away with murder — figuratively speaking, of course.

had connections with the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

"It's just a fun way to start out the year in a positive manner," Bailey said.

UPC started After Hours seven years ago as First Fridays, which takes place the first Friday of each month. After it became popular among students, Bailey said UPC started doing programs every Friday night. UPC has its After Hours events planned for the fall semester, and campus organizations can contact UPC to cosponsor the events, Bailey said.

After Hours provides a different on-campus, substance-free activity for students each Friday night. While several hundred to about 1,000 students participate each Friday night, the weekly attendance is about 400 students, Bailey said.

"It's a means of providing safe, fun, typically free entertainment for students," Bailey said. "It's an alternative to going to Aggieville."

VOLLEYBALL

Wildcats claim title in Shocker Volleyball Classic

By Jonathan Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Just one match into the 2007 season, coach Suzie Fritz could say something about her team that wouldn't have been true a year ago.

"The biggest thing that I saw is this team has a mentality that they are going to win the close ones," Fritz said. "They proved that to me this weekend."

K-State overcame a 2-1 deficit to edge No. 14 Cal Poly Friday in the opening round of the Shocker Volleyball Classic.

The Wildcats followed that victory with back-to-back wins against North Texas and Wichita State on Saturday to claim the tournament title.

The win over Cal Poly was K-State's first five-game victory since 2005.

Nataly Korobkova, the preseason Big 12 Player of the Year, led the Wildcats with 26 kills against the Mustangs.

Fritz said Korobkova is finding her niche on the court.

"She is exceptional," Fritz said. "When we needed a kill at critical times, she was the one we went to. She lived up to our expectations of her. She is just a very special player and extremely talented."

After taming the Mustangs, K-State went on to defeat North Texas 3-0 Saturday.

K-State won the third game 30-6, setting a school record for fewest points allowed.

North Texas struggled to convert kills, recording just 19 on 96 attacks.

Senior Angie Lastra added 12 digs for K-State.

"Angie is a playmaker," Fritz said. "She made a lot of subtle little plays happen. She makes a thousand little plays that keep our team in system that a lot of people might not even notice."

Finally, the Wildcats shocked Wichita State in front of 6,024 fans Saturday, winning 3-1 to seal the title.

"I thought we played well late in games," Fritz said. "That gave us the opportunity to win matches."

After finishing 0-5 in five-game matches in 2006, the Wildcats already have shown improvement with their five-game win against Cal Poly.

Now that the 2007 season is underway, the Wildcats' 2006 finish will not haunt them anymore.

"We're over last year," Fritz said. "We are just looking forward now."

The Wildcats' home opener is set for Tuesday at 6 p.m. against the Houston Cougars at Ahearn Field House.

Nataly Korobkova, 9, recorded 19 kills and 12 digs during K-State's 3-1 championship win over Wichita State Saturday in the Best Western Shocker Volleyball Classic. K-State defeated Cal Poly, 3-2; North Texas, 3-0, and the Shockers to win the title.

Kids' sports should not be aired

When I was 11 years old, I got a baseball glove with a genuine, authentic, facsimile signature from George Brett in the pocket.

MEEK

Brett was my first sports hero, so the glove was a big deal. I still remember the way it smelled, the way the ball would pop against the leather.

Every spring, I would dig that glove out of the garage and head to the ball field with my dad. He would hit fungoes and toss during batting practice, and we would talk baseball.

That's just one memory that remains from a largely unremarkable Little League career. There are more, of course—the smell of freshly mowed grass, the taste of warm grape soda, the feeling I would get when I realized the ball was going over my head. (In, in, in ... almost got it ... oh, nuts! Back, back, back ...)

Of all my Little League memories, I don't recall any TV cameras or postgame interviews. But if you happened to flip to ABC or ESPN this weekend, you could have watched four teams of 12-year-olds competing for the Little League World Series championship.

As televised competition goes, we've certainly seen worse. (Coming up at 8, competitive sleeping!) That's a topic for another day.

No, this is about what it means to be a kid playing Little League baseball.

On Saturday, the Associated Press sent a story across the wire with the headline, "Minnesota team apologizes for handshake spitting."

Apparently, ESPN cameras caught two players spitting on their hands before the traditional postgame handshake after Minnesota was eliminated from the World Series on Wednesday.

It might come as a great shock to sports fans across the world, but this type of thing is not exactly uncommon in Little League baseball. We are still waiting for a story with the headline, "Team apologizes for 'hey batter' chant."

The incident underscores a broader point: 12-year-old athletes do not belong on national television. Whether they are spitting on their hands or dropping a fly ball, these kids should not have their misdeeds beamed to living rooms across the country.

America has an insatiable appetite for sports — just look at the hours we devote to message boards, recruiting Web sites and fantasy football drafts. We put our athletes under the microscope and zoom in as close as we possibly can.

Professional athletes understand their every move will be scrutinized and dissected in the sports pages, or at least they should. But is it fair to thrust a 12-year-old child in front of a camera and broadcast his fears and failures to a national audience?

The answer is irrelevant, I suppose, because we have gone too far to turn back now. But I cannot help but wonder if we have sacrificed some of the purity and the innocence of Little League baseball. When you put kids and their heroes on the same stage, some of the magic inevitably gets lost.

I still remember putting on that glove and pretending I was playing third base for the Kansas City Royals. But deep down, I knew I wasn't George Brett. He was a star, and I was still me — a chubby kid with lousy depth perception.

Looking back, I wouldn't have wanted it any other way.

Rita Liliom suffered a season-ending injury before the start of the 2006 volleyball season. Liliom will begin her junior season with hopes of helping the Wildcats improve on a 12-18 record from 2006.

Liliom returns in new season after severe knee injury

By Joel Jellison
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Rita Liliom was set to be a big contributor to the K-State volleyball team in 2006, but the junior never even made it into the season.

Liliom suffered a season-ending injury when she tore the anterior cruciate ligament in her left knee Aug. 19, 2006 in a scrimmage.

The injury sidelined Liliom until the spring volleyball schedule when she was able to get back on the court and get some playing time on her knee.

"To see a player, any player, have to go through what Rita had to go through to try to come back, that's a hard rehab," said K-State volleyball coach Suzie Fritz. "An ACL is a hard rehab when you're a volleyball player, and you have to come back and try to play with confidence."

While one might think coming back on an injured knee could be a nerve-racking experience, Liliom said her desire to play beat out her nerves.

"When I started to play, I wanted to play so badly I wasn't caring about it," Liliom said.

She saw action in 102 games as a sophomore, averaging 2.45 kills and 2.25 digs per game.

Liliom was projected to average more than three kills a game for the Wildcats before the injury.

As this season progresses, Fritz said she hopes Liliom will gain confidence to play without worry of injury and find her role with the Wildcats.

"I'm thrilled to have her back," Fritz said. "I think she is still trying to figure out some things after being out last year — what her role is and how she is going to come back and be confident and not be afraid to get hurt again."

Liliom had an opportunity to play in front of the K-State crowd again when she participated in the Purple and White Scrimmage Aug. 18.

It was not difficult to spot Liliom at the event, as she wore a large black brace on her left knee.

Though it was just a scrimmage, Liliom said it was enough to get her excited about the new season.

"I'm ready," she said. "This one year has gotten me excited, and I am ready for this year. I don't think I can tell you in words."

The junior has already made her presence felt, posting nine kills in a win over North Texas and contributing seven kills in the upset of No. 14 Cal Poly at this weekend's Shocker Volleyball Classic.

Huard to start

Damon Huard, who has spent his career backing up some of the NFL's top quarterbacks, is finally No. 1. Coach Herm Edwards said Saturday the 11-year veteran will start for the Kansas City Chiefs.

Huard hadn't started a game since 2000 but went 5-3 last season after Trent Green was injured in the season opener. After Green demanded a trade to Miami this spring because he thought coaches planned to hand the job to Brodie Croyle, Huard spent the summer battling the second-year man from Alabama.

Korobkova wins tournament MVP

K-State's Nataly Korobkova was named the Most Valuable Player of the Shocker Volleyball Classic on Sunday, a day after leading the Wildcats to the tournament title.

In her first appearance as a Wildcat, Korobkova recorded 26 kills and 11 digs in K-State's 3-2 upset of No. 14 Cal

Korobkova

Poly. She recorded another double-double in Saturday's match against Wichita State, finishing with 19 kills and 12 digs.

Junior middle blocker Megan Farr and senior libero Angie Lastra also were named to the all-tournament team.

Farr established a new career high with 10 blocks in the opening match against Cal Poly.

Lastra recorded 24 digs in the opening match, her 21st career match with 20 or more digs.

Tennis club sets first meeting

STAFF REPORT

The K-State tennis club will hold its first-ever meeting at 7 tonight at the Peters Recreation Complex tennis courts.

Club president Alex Richardson, junior in computer science, founded the group because he said he was struggling to find players to compete against.

"The frustrating thing was other people were having the same problem," he said. "So a few of my tennis friends got together one night to draft up a constitution."

Richardson said he hopes to have weekly practices and eventually compete against other clubs and junior-college teams.

The K-State tennis club is part of the U.S. Tennis Association's Tennis on Campus program, which connects club teams from across the country.

The K-State tennis club recently received a $1,000 grant from the USTA.

There is no cost to join the K-State tennis club, though participants are asked to provide their own equipment.

Band's sound too big for Kathouse

Grazgrove

Concert review by Eric Davis

Saturday night the KatHouse Lounge was filled with the sounds of Grazgrove, a local band whose star is on the rise.

When the five-person group gets together to play, a super-charged rock sound escapes the speakers. The music the band plays is a mixture of rock and blues with a small amount of bluegrass thrown in for good measure.

The band places little emphasis on theatrics, putting on a meager light show, and what they lack in flash, the music played makes up for it by far. A small fog machine was also present on stage and was controlled by a pedal under the keyboard.

The show began at 10 and few were present when the lights went down. However, as the show wore on, the crowd began to fill out and the boys got more and more comfortable.

Comprised of a drummer, two guitar players, a bassist and the keyboards, Grazgrove is not a band driven by its drummer. Chad Brothers, the lead singer, drives the sound with his guitar and Grant Haun, the man on the keys, supplements that sound with all kinds of great noises from his keys.

The skill of the rhythm guitarist, bassist and drummer are great, but can best be described as supplemental.

As the level of comfort rose, so did the quality of music that was playing. Jamming from song to song a few times, the band demonstrated its tightness in an amazing way.

The music also was easy to dance to. Most at the show could be seen at least tapping a toe, and one concert goer could be seen dancing wildly in the front of the stage.

The roof of the bar did more to hurt the sound than anything. There are some bands you need to see outside and Grazgrove is one of them. The music made is a very big sound and is not meant to be dampened at all. KatHouse is a great bar, but not the greatest venue for Grazgrove to be playing at.

The members of the crowd did not care about the dampened sound and were almost as varied as the sound being played on stage. Members of the crowd were dressed in everything from business suits to rolled up jeans and a T-shirt.

Overall, the show was very good. The band was crisp, had a clean sound and played together well. The next time these guys are near, go see them.

Anderson Elias, Altair Martins and Wallace Conceição, drum players from the band AfroReggae, dance as they perform with the rest of the band Sunday evening at the Bosco Student Plaza. The performance was part of a Movies on the Grass event that included a nonviolence rally and a showing of "Favela Rising," a documentary featuring the band.

Brazilian band fills Bosco Student Plaza with reggae music

By Nicholas Birdsong
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The loud, fast-paced sounds of AfroReggae filled the air in Bosco Student Plaza Sunday night.

AfroReggae played at K-State as part of a collaborative effort between several organizations. Movies on the Grass sponsors were the main group responsible for bringing the band to Kansas.

Rhondalyn Peairs, event coordinator and director of the DOW Chemical Multicultural Research Center in Hale Library, spearheaded the effort to bring AfroReggae to campus.

Peairs wanted AfroReggae to come to K-State after watching the movie "Favela Rising," which tells the band's story.

"I was inspired by their story," Peairs said. "They use music as a tool for empowerment."

AfroReggae formed in Brazil from a desire to improve socioeconomic conditions, according to AfroReggae's Web site.

The group came to K-State for an evening of activities planned around the showing of "Favela Rising." The band played at 6 p.m., and the film showed afterward at Coffman Commons.

A favela is a Brazilian squatter settlement, according to the band's Web site.

Movies on the Grass worked with other campus organizations as well to make the band's performance possible. The Center for Nonviolence was one of many groups that sponsored the event, along with the International Student Center and the Center for Discourse and Democracy.

The Center for Nonviolence supported the event because AfroReggae's story is an example of how to use music to gather together and create social change, said Victor Force, coordinator of Social Justice events at K-State and graduate student in sociology.

AfroReggae has a varied sound with elements of several different styles. Heavy and energetic drum beats combined with some rap lyrics and traditional reggae singing defined the group's sound.

"It is different than most music you hear around here," said Kate Herzog, junior in biology. "It's really heavy with the drums."

Others said they weren't into the music.

"It's not my kind of music, but it is very interesting to listen to it," said Anni Wichers, a K-State foreign exchange student studying English.

17-year-old unlocks iPhone; mobile device to work without AT&T

A 17-year-old New Jersey resident figured out how to unlock AT&T's iPhone for use on other carriers.

George Hotz used a set of software and a soldering iron in order to crack AT&T's code for the phone.

Claiming the unlocking took him 500 hours to complete, Hotz modified two phones, one for personal use and one he listed on eBay.

Hotz's technique is not the only that has emerged to break the codes on the phone. The writers of the software claim they break the codes to enable people the freedom to use any phone on any network.

In order for an iPhone user to use the phone on any network, Hotz put detailed instructions up on his Web site. The complex instructions might be difficult for many to do, but Hotz has hope that someone else will look at the instructions and simplify the procedure.

2 Ft. Riley soldiers die Friday

By Annette Lawless
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two Fort Riley soldiers were killed in a noncombat-related incident on Aug. 24 in Herat, Afghanistan.

Sgt. 1st Class Scott M. Carney and Sgt. 1st Class Daniel E. Miller died as passengers in a Humvee rollover during convoy operations, according to the Department of Defense.

The circumstances surrounding the incident are under investigation.

Carney, 37, was a mobilized Iowa National Guard soldier serving on a transition team assigned to the 1st Brigade, 1st Infantry Division.

Originally from Ankeny, Iowa, Carney entered the National Guard in June 1991.

The Department of the Army has posthumously promoted Carney to master sergeant as of Monday.

He began serving with the 1st Infantry Division in February 2007.

According to the Iowa Army National Guard, Carney, a graduate of Upper Iowa University, was the 20th member of the Iowa Army National Guard to die on duty related to missions in operations in Iraq and Afghanistan since 2003.

Miller, 43, of Rossford, Ohio, was an infantryman serving on the same transition team.

He entered the Army in June 1986 and began serving with the 1st Infantry Division in November 2006. This was his first deployment in support of the Global War on Terrorism.

As members of the transition team, the two participated in a 60-day training cycle to prepare small teams of U.S. soldiers, airmen and sailors to advise, teach, mentor and coach their Iraqi or Afghan counterparts, according to the Fort Riley Public Affairs Office.

Carney and Miller's deaths raise the Fort Riley soldier death count to 122 while serving in support of Operation Iraqi Freedom and Operation Enduring Freedom.

Social events headline 1st fraternity recruitment

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State men have the opportunity to be themselves this week during the first fraternity recruitment week.

The Interfraternity Council started its "Be You, Be Greek" recruitment campaign Sunday, which will end Thursday night. Fraternities will have informational booths in the K-State Student Union Food Court throughout the week, as well as recruitment events during the evenings.

The recruitment week's purpose is to increase the membership standards within fraternities at K-State, said Brad Puderbaugh, IFC public relations director and senior in mass communications.

"We're looking for good men who came to K-State and maybe didn't know much about the greek system," he said. "We're also aiming for older guys who aren't in fraternities yet — it's never too late."

While four fraternities at K-State changed their statuses during the 2006-07 academic year, IFC Recruitment Director Kyle Hill said the recruitment week is a project that many people within Greek Affairs had envisioned prior to last year to help better promote the greek system.

"Not everybody knows about fraternities and sororities coming into college," said Hill, senior in management. "We're just hoping to get the word out there and encourage them to check it out."

Delta Chi and Delta Tau Delta moved out of house during the 2006-07 academic year. Sigma Pi established a charter at K-State and became a housed chapter, while Pi Kappa Phi moved to alumni status for return at a future date, said Scott

Jones said the greek community always is in a state of change. About 1,600 men are in fraternities at K-State, which includes about

Kansas Board of Regents approves 5-year tuition plan to begin this semester

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State students will pay $15 more per credit hour this year than last year.

The five-year plan, arranged by the Special Committee to Study Long-Term Tuition Strategies in spring 2006, will increase tuition fees every year by $15 a credit hour. Tuition for Kansas residents is $187.50 per credit hour and $512 for out-of-state residents, an 8-percent increase from last year.

The plan, called a predicted-tuition rate, was implemented to eliminate confusing and unpredictable tuition plans and allow students a way of knowing what their tuition rates will be in the future, according to the final tuition-strategy proposal.

"What our committee decided to go with is the predictable route," said Bruce Shubert, associate vice president for administration and finance.

The committee included eight student senators and faculty members — Shubert; Tom Herald, then-Faculty Senate president; Ruth Dyer, associate provost; Pat Bosco, dean of student life.

According to the proposal, which the Kansas Board of Regents accepted earlier this year, the plan will set aside money for several funding initiatives on campus.

"With the five-year plan, we have an initiative of places we hope to send those tuition dollars," Student Body President Matt Wagner said.

These initiatives include faculty salary enhancements, financial aid, the College of Arts and Sciences, Hale Library and a variety of other institutional and academic enhancements.

Wagner said the SGA committee in charge of tuition planning will look at the five-year tuition plan this semester to see if it is the best option.

"We'll discuss that as the committee meets later this semester," Wagner said. "We're always going to toss around ideas."

According to the first proposal, the committee looked at two other tuition models: a differential rate model and a flat tuition rate model. The differential rate model would charge higher rates for higher-level courses. The flat tuition rate model would charge the same per-credit-hour rate for four years for each incoming freshman class.

The University of Kansas adopted the fixed-rate model this semester for incoming freshmen. KU Student Body President Hannah Love said students were tired of the massive yearly tuition increases.

"Students weren't happy not knowing how much they would have to pay the next year," Love said. "The fixed-tuition model is more stable and steady so students and parents weren't caught off guard."

The fixed-tuition plan, also called guaranteed or contracted tuition, will charge incoming freshman $213 per credit hour for four fiscal school years, a 15-percent increase from last year. All other students, including transfers, will pay $194.80 per credit hour this year and be subject to the previous tuition plan at KU.

Students attending more than four years of college will be subject to Kansas Board of Regents tuition rates. Future freshmen classes will pay a fixed tuition rate higher than the previous classes determined by the Student Senate and based on inflation rates.

Wagner said the committee rejected the fixed-tuition model because it did not account for unpredictable tuition increases.

"The problem is we can't look that far ahead," Wagner

Wagner also said K-State freshmen under the current plan still will pay less than KU freshmen under the fixed-rate tuition.

Fake Indian tribes sell phony memberships

By Whitney Hodgins
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

More than 12,000 memberships to unrecognized American Indian tribes have been sold to illegal immigrants led to believe the affiliation would help them avoid deportation and even provide U.S. citizenship.

Several federal agencies, including the Bureau of Indian Affairs and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, have denied the legitimacy of the groups and their promises of citizenship.

An investigation of reported recruitment in several states is under way, while the U.S. attorney's office in Kansas is leading an indictment of two Mexicans who tried to obtain U.S. passports and social security cards using their illegitimate membership in Wichita.

Both groups, the Kaweah Indian Nation and Pembina Nation Little Shell, have been denied recognition by the BIA in the past and are not American Indian tribes. Even if they were federally recognized, they would not have the ability to offer U.S. citizenship to anyone, said Tim Counts, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement spokesman, in an Aug. 16 USA Today article.

The Kaweah group — based in Wichita, admitted to selling 10,000 memberships to Mexican immigrants willing to pay anything from $50 to $1,200 for the chance at U.S. citizenship, in an Aug. 21 Associated Press article.

"An actual Native American tribe isn't a club," said Jesse Caplinger, a fifth-year student in milling science. "You can't sell membership — you just have to be born into it."

Mexican citizens Carmen Zamora, 44, and her husband Angel, 38, were arrested for attempting to use their Kaweah membership to purchase U.S. passports and social security cards. Carmen also was caught driving 40 illegal immigrants to Wichita to obtain their own Kaweah memberships, according to an Aug. 16 article in the Wichita Eagle. The couple might face deportation, and their hearings began Wednesday.

"This is an exceedingly opportunistic business scam," said Rob Dunn, sophomore in English literature. "Taking advantage of underprivileged sects of society to screw them out of their money isn't a new idea, but this disrespects legitimate American Indian tribes."

Court rules former student editors have no claim

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The U.S. Supreme Court is the final option in a three-year court battle between two former Collegian editors and K-State.

The 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled July 26 the claims of plaintiffs Sarah Rice and Katie Lane, both former Collegian editors, are now moot since "there is no reasonable expectation that Lane and Rice will be subjected, post-graduation, to censorship by defendants in connection with that paper," according to a July 27 Student Press Law Center report.

On Aug. 20, the appellate court denied Lane and Rice's petition for a rehearing before the entire circuit court.

Rice said she and Lane, along with their lawyers, will decide within the next week whether to appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Rice and Lane filed suit in 2004 after then-Collegian adviser Ron Johnson was removed from his advising position.

By the recommendation of Todd Simon, then-director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications and chair of the board overseeing the Collegian, Johnson was relieved of his duties as Student Publications Inc. director and Collegian adviser, effective May 24, 2004, according to a May 11, 2004, Collegian article.

According to a July 27 Student Press Law Center article, Simon has said Johnson was removed because Johnson's advising was to blame for the Collegian's "sub-par scope and quality of news coverage."

Johnson was later reassigned as an assistant professor in the Miller School.

According to the May 11, 2004, article, during the spring 2004 semester, Black Student Union members called for Johnson's resignation as a permanent solution to what they said was a lack of diversity coverage.

Cheryl Strecker, K-State senior associate attorney, declined an interview with the Collegian about the case.

Strecker said in a July 31 K-State Media Relations and Marketing press release that there was no live "case or controversy," which left the Court of Appeals with no jurisdiction to hear the appeal.

"This was a performance-based personnel action, pure and simple," Strecker said. "There was never any attempt to censor or control the content of the Collegian. The decisions of two federal courts, in which no wrongdoing by K-State was found, should be enough to lay this matter to rest."

Mark Goodman, Student Press Law Center executive director, said rehearing requests in federal appellate courts are rare. Goodman also said if a strong dissent exists with the three original judges, it is more likely the case will be reheard.

"In this case, though, there was no dissent with the three judges," Goodman said.

Goodman said the 10th Circuit Court's ruling was a "terrible decision."

"What the court ultimately decided is when students graduate, they can no longer pursue First Amendment cases," he said. "As any rational person should understand, the likelihood that a legal proceeding will be concluded in one to two years is very slim."

Rice said the situation made herself and Lane lose faith in authority.

"I think personally what I learned from the last three years is that just because someone is in a position of authority doesn't mean that they always have your best interests in heart," Rice said. "The courts were not understanding, and all along the way, we have had to keep fighting since it's something we believe in."

University officials involved in the case have maintained students' interests as their concern all along and that K-State upholds students' free speech in all aspects, according to a July 31 K-State Media Relations and Marketing release.

"There has never been an administrator on this campus who has tried to control the content of the Collegian," said College of Arts and Sciences dean Stephen White, one of the administrators involved in Johnson's reassignment.

White declined to comment any further on the case.

Goodman said K-State's reputation is tainted with the court's ruling. However, he also said college journalists, educators and First Amendment organizations will never see the case as over.

"What is most sad about it is that the name of Kansas State University is going to go down as the name responsible for preventing students' First Amendment claims," Goodman said. "The university administration also believes this is over. I can tell you from my perspective — not a chance."

K-State professor a common source for Kansas political analysis, commentary

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Type the name Joe Aistrup into Google News, and at least a few stories concerning pertinent Kansas political issues will appear.

Joe Aistrup, head of the Department of Political Science, is one of the go-to sources for Kansas political analysis. His name appears in news articles about issues ranging from Kansas gubernatorial races to Sam Brownback's presidential campaign.

"They call me because of my own expertise," Aistrup said. "I have been observing Kansas politics since the early '90s, and I think that has a little to do with it."

Though Aistrup said he does not receive too many calls this time of year because of the lack of political action, he receives numerous calls once local elections heat up. He said four to six months before the elections, he starts to receive at least four calls a week asking for analysis.

Last year he said he started receiving calls about the 2006 elections as early as March.

Aistrup said journalists turn to him as a political analyst, not for a biased opinion.

"I comment as a political scientist, not as a republican or democrat," he said. "I think, 'How does this fit in the pattern of politics?'"

Though Aistrup said he has received calls since the early 2000s, he has commented on Kansas politics for several years. He has had several works published in political journals.

He said he has seen little change in the Kansas political landscape since he started following Kansas politics in the early 1990s.

Aistrup said three political factions constantly have battled for different rights: the individualistic faction, typically associated with moderate republicans; the moral hierarchy faction, typically conservative; and equality faction, typically democrat.

"I think the ongoing battle is what might be called a clash of cultures," he said.

The fight for dominance in the state government never has been peaceful, he said.

"If I've seen anything in Kansas, the conflict has intensified," Aistrup said.

Aistrup also is a top source for analysis on Sen. Sam Brownback's, R-Kan., presidential campaign.

After a poor performance Aug. 11 at the Iowa straw poll, one of the first indicators of campaign strength, Aistrup said the success of the campaign is bleak.

"I think Sam's third-place finish in Iowa is not a good omen for his campaign," he said. "This suggests that 2008 might be a bad year for the Brownback campaign, but it's definitely not over for them."

Aistrup does not just provide political analysis. The calls are just an occasional break from his busy schedule.

He leads the political science department, teaches and also conducts research on Kansas politics. He was named head of the department in 2002.

Previously, he served as director of the Docking Institute of Public Affairs at Fort Hays State University and taught classes. There, he said he learned much about politics and universities.

"I think what I learned was how to deal with university administrators and handle how to work with other professors," he said. "I also got to know a lot about the dynamic of Kansas politics."

Many in the department believe Aistrup has helped improve the political science department.

John Fliter, associate professor of political science, said Aistrup is a solid head of the department and is easy to work with.

"He's good with people, he has good managerial skills, and he has great vision for the department," Fliter said. "Since he's been here, we've taken some great steps forward."

Much like his political analysis, Aistrup said he removes all biases when lecturing students and dealing with faculty.

"In the political science department, we are trying to give students a sense of the different disciplines of political science," Aistrup said.

He said several students enter the curriculum expecting more of an issue-driven focus, rather than institutional.

"I think what happens is a difference between understanding processing systems and knowing the specifics like hardball issues," he said. "Day-to-day issues are for journalists."

Aistrup said about 300 undergraduate students are political science majors or minors. The graduate school has three master's programs: public administration, political science and security studies, which addresses careers in international security.

Aistrup said undergraduates at K-State have several options and career opportunities after graduation. And though the political science department has a graduate school, Aistrup said he encourages undergraduates to go elsewhere and experience something different.

"(Graduates) go to a variety of places," he said. "Many go to not-for-profit or the private sector. Some go to grad school or law school, and we encourage that."

TO THE POINT

Proposal plans for future

The Kansas Board of Regents approved a five-year tuition plan for K-State that will increase tuition fees each year by $15 per credit hour.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

It's time for students to pick their battles.

Tuition will increase, no matter what we do. Instead of fighting the increase, students should make their voices heard to ensure the increases are fair and thought out.

Luckily, that's what happened.

During the 2005-06 school year, the Special Committee to Study Long-Term Tuition Strategies formed, with eight student senators and faculty members, and they chose this plan for K-State.

The University of Kansas adopted a fixed-rate model this year for incoming freshmen because of the students' disapproval of yearly tuition increases, which means students will pay a fixed tuition rate each semester for four years. Those in each sequential class will pay more, but tuition will stay the same for their first four years as well.

The problem with this plan is that each year, new students pay more.

The plan K-State has adopted is more forward-thinking. The ad-hoc committee focused on what was best for K-State students and the future of the university.

If each new class of students coming into K-State must pay more than the students did the previous year, the K-State community could lose potential students.

It was a hard battle fought by our representatives, but the student body will see victory and a brighter future for K-State.

Sooner rather than later

Early primaries will eliminate candidates too quickly

Presidential elections take place every four years on the second Tuesday of November, and the next one is almost 15 months from now.

Candidates, news sources and state governments seem to think it's happening much earlier. Not only have there been 5,438 democratic and republican debates, but also state governments have tried to jump in front of others to be the first and most influential primary.

SCOTT GIRARD

Though the candidates have said basically the same things at every debate, they keep coming like a broken tennis ball-shooting-machine.

And even though the election isn't for 15 months, states want to determine the candidates earlier this year.

Last week, Michigan senators ruled to move their primary to Jan. 15, and some senators want it to be even earlier. This means the traditionally first primaries in Iowa and New Hampshire, which are usually in mid-January and already have been moved up, most likely will be pushed forward at least a week before the next primary.

But states want to be Iowa and New Hampshire, so they act like little children trying to be the first one in line for lunch in a grade-school cafeteria. They have no thought on how this will affect the candidates or voters.

With primaries moving closer into 2007, lesser candidates will not have the time to campaign and gain recognition. By the time many people learn about Ron Paul or Mike Huckabee, they already will be out of the election.

Polls already have shown that the candidates with the most name recognition — Hillary Clinton — and those with the most money — Mitt Romney — garner the most attention from voters and media.

Mitt Romney won the Iowa straw poll handily earlier this month. Two serious candidates, John McCain and Rudy Giuliani, didn't participate, but Romney showed what money can do to voters.

Romney spent at least twice as much in television advertising than most of the second-tier candidates have in their war chest. He spent $2.4 million on TV ads and at least another $2 million on other ads, while the runner-up in Iowa, Mike Huckabee, raised just $766,000, and the results divided along those lines.

There is no end in sight for Romney either; he has millions of dollars in assets and fundraising. How can lesser-name candidates keep up with Romney and others when the amount they spend on two weeks of ads is what Romney probably spends on a toilet seat?

The lesser candidates have little or no chance to win their candidacy, so it basically turns into a game of which candidate can spend the most money the fastest. That means McCain, who fired several campaign advisers because of fund insufficiencies, could be in trouble also.

So the candidates with the most money will spend to their hearts' content in Iowa, New Hampshire, Florida and any other state they want to win, and the states will vote for them in the primaries as early as the end of this year.

The Democratic and Republican party candidates will be determined early next year. Imagine the spending those two candidates will go through. Their spending will probably compare to the whole gross domestic product of several African countries.

There will be advertisements all over the television and radio. We will hear each candidate bicker about the issues, telling us what is wrong about the other candidate for at least 10 months. By the time Nov. 2, 2008, rolls around, we will be burned out from the situation.

One positive consequence of the early primaries is we will only have to hear two peoples' generalized, prepared statements everywhere we go, instead of 20.

This will give us the opportunity to know the candidates personally and hear the candidates' stances.

The old, "I just didn't know the candidates excuse," won't be applicable this election season.

Jess Boatwright | COLLEGIAN

Voters should endorse children's safety advocates

Once again, the secular-progressive ideal of ultra-tolerance has penetrated the justice system and protected pedophiles who flagrantly disregard morals and values.

We, as adults, have the duty to protect children. When we look in the face of evil and turn the other cheek without a second thought, justice will not prevail.

On Aug. 22, The New York Times reported charges were dropped against self-proclaimed pedophile Jack McClellan, because the judge presiding over the case failed to set a hearing to argue the merits and had not given McClellan proper notice.

Because of this legal technicality, McClellan walked away from the charges with the satisfaction of knowing he can stay just out of arm's reach from the law.

Though McClellan has not been convicted of any crimes, he is providing pedophiles with the tools to harm children.

McClellan created a Web site, which served as a guide to other pedophiles, providing them with pictures of girls and described the best locations to find them.

"He also discussed how he liked to stake out parks, public libraries, fast-food restaurants and other areas where little girls, or 'LGs,' congregate," Fox News reported on Aug. 14.

Not only is this situation not being addressed through legal means, but McClellan is becoming a martyr for sadistic thinking and behavior within the law's boundaries.

With an injustice of this sort, we must reflect on the words of U.S. Supreme Court Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, whose insight still resounds through the years.

"The question in every case is whether the words used are used in such circumstances and are such a nature as to create a clear and present danger," Holmes said. McClellan's words and thoughts can be seen only as dangerous to the children around him.

UCLA law professor Eugene Volokh spoke about the situation on July 30 on ABC News, saying, "You can't arrest (McClellan) for advocating."

But what about those people who were hanging on McClellan's every word? Should people who rape and sodomize children be let off as easily as he was?

Take the case involving convicted sex offender Paul Cisneros. Kansas Third District Judge Matthew Dowd had the responsibility of sentencing Cisneros, a convicted sex-offender with one count of rape and three counts of aggravated criminal sodomy, with a child incapable of consent, eight counts of criminal sodomy with a child and five counts of indecent liberties with a child.

"Dowd, on May 25, departed downward from sentencing guidelines to put Cisneros on three years of probation after suspending the imposition of a 12-year, 11-month prison sentence," the Topeka Capital-Journal reported on Aug. 10.

Dowd did the justice system a huge disservice when he let the sex offender walk. His tolerance of Cisneros' actions was not only a slap in the face to the victim's family, but is also a reflection of the desensitization so many people have undergone since the advent of sexual expressionism.

If judges are not going to administer justice, then it is the responsibility of voters to endorse only those people running for office who advocate what is right and just.

No parent who cares about their children would want someone like Jack Mc-Clellan mentally or physically raping their babies. But he, as well as other predators, walks among us, thanks to tolerant judges who do not know when to stand up and take action.

By not taking any preemptive measures to safeguard our children, we can only expect to perpetuate cruel and intolerable behavior.

Public Library to offer informal location for children, parents to watch movies

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Children and young adults have opportunities to watch popular movies for free at the Manhattan Public Library throughout the semester.

The movies include "Cars," "Bridge to Terabithia" and "Confessions of a Teenage Drama Queen."

From eight-months to 18, children, teens and families of all ages are invited to watch the free showings taking place about once a month in the library auditorium.

Jessica Long, children's programming assistant for the library, said the screening times are chosen on days kids are let out of school early or have days off, and the expected turnout is anywhere between 10 and 60 people.

"I think it's a great opportunity to get families into the library," she said, "especially families that cannot afford to take their kids out to the movies."

The library's viewing equipment, which includes a big screen projector and sound system, was implemented in early 2006, said children's department manager Jennifer Adams. Since obtaining a film license, Adams said the library has shown movies from a number of different studios, including Disney and Paramount, as soon as they come out on DVD.

"It's a nice entertainment thing we can do free of charge in a quiet, cool environment," she said. "I think people feel really comfortable in the library, not just because it's free, but because it's a little less formal than being in the movie theater. If kids need to move around or if parents need to get up, leave and come back, it's not as big of a deal here."

Janeen Hill, young adult librarian, said most of the movies shown have literary tie-ins or are based on books. This is so the library can promote its literature collection as well as prompt kids who are not big readers to pick up a novel or short story every now and then.

"It's just nice for (the kids) to have something else to do - to get them out of the house, to have somewhere to

El Cazador to reopen Wednesday barring complications

By Hannah Blick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The El Cazador restaurant is scheduled to reopen for lunch Wednesday, said S. M. Samarra, executive vice president of S & S development and property manager for the local Mexican restaurant.

However, this is not a definite time because setbacks are always a possibility, Samarra said.

Immigration and Customs Enforcement closed the restaurant Thursday, Aug. 16, when they discovered that owner Santiago Paolino-Hernandez was employing 18 illegal immigrants.

Paolino-Hernandez refused to comment.

Brandon Geiger, senior in construction science, has eaten at El Cazador on several occasions prior to its closing.

"We would go for the cheese dip - it was delicious," Geiger said. "We were pretty mad when they were shut down again."

El Cazador also was shut down once in 2004 for employing illegal immigrants.

A.J. Jensen, senior in animal science, said he thought the punishment should be harsher for the owners of restaurants caught employing illegal immigrants.

"If (Paolino-Hernandez) is already out of jail and reopening, then something is wrong," Jensen said. "I don't understand why they don't increase the punishment. That's the only way (lawbreakers) will learn their lesson."

Jensen also said he feels it is Kansas' responsibility to monitor the problem by closely watching repeat offenders and making routine check-ups on employee records.

Geiger, however, said he will return to El Cazador's for cheese dip.

"It doesn't really bother me who's cooking it, as long as it's cheap and tasty," Geiger said.

Consumer group says change might hurt phone customers

WICHITA - An attempt to make phone bills in Kansas easier to understand could allow phone companies to raise rates and cut off phone service easier, a consumer watchdog agency said.

The Citizens' Utility Ratepayer Board, a state-appointed body that represents residential and small business customers before state regulators, said a proposal to eliminate state regulations in favor of federal ones would do away with many consumer protections.

The agency has pushed for simpler phone bills for two years but was surprised last week when a member of the Kansas Corporation Commission asked witnesses to prepare testimony for the effects of removing the state regulations in favor of those passed by the Federal Communications Commission.

"If they go through with that, consumers are going to lose protection they've had for 24 years," said Steve Rarrick, a telecommunications attorney for the board. "If I were a telephone company and didn't want to comply with state rules, I'd be thrilled."

In fact, several phone companies said they support switching from state regulations to the FCC's Truth in Billing requirements.

"AT&T believes the current federal rules provide adequate protection for both residence and business customers," Cyn-di Gallagher, the telecommunications giant's regulatory director told the Wichita Eagle for a story in Monday's edition.

State and federal regulations cover only the most basic phone service charges. But the Kansas rules control how customers are billed and prevent unfair practices.

Those state controls aren't provided by the federal rules, staff with the citizen's board and the KCC said.

The state's regulations include controls on when a phone company can require a deposit and how much, under what circumstances a phone company can disconnect service, how much notice a company must give customers before changing rates, how much they can charge in fees for late payments and returned checks and the kind of refunds customers can receive for significant service interruptions.

The citizen's board and industry representatives were before the KCC last week debating whether the state needs to add to its regulations, such as a rule on whether phone companies can turn off a customer's local service when they fail to pay long-distance bills and if companies should be able to lower their basic phone rates by breaking out more costs as surcharges on the monthly bill.

Commissioner Michael Moffett told both sides to draw up arguments on what would happen if the state replaced its own regulations with those of the FCC.

Rarrick said he didn't oppose the FCC's regulations, which cover such things as plain-language descriptions of service charges, customer notification if providers change and a toll-free number to register complaints or request information.

But he said those rules aren't specific enough.

"There are a lot of holes that state commissions have always had the responsibility to fill," he said.

Industry officials regularly push for eliminating state regulations in favor of federal ones, saying it's costly and confusing to comply with rules that can shift from state to state. The problem is especially pointed as phone companies fight for market share against wireless phones, Internet service and cable companies, many of whom don't have to deal with the same regulations.

Forum to give citizens chance to air concerns

By Megan Molitor
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Community members wishing to voice their thoughts or concerns about the National Bio and Agro-Defense facility that might come to Manhattan will have their chance tonight.

A forum will take place from 6 to 7 tonight in Forum Hall at the K-State Student Union to discuss the possibility of the facility coming to Manhattan.

"Manhattan and K-State were chosen as one of the five finalists to be considered for possible placement," said Ron Fehr, Manhattan City Manager. "Representatives from the Department of Homeland Security, United States Department of Agriculture and other experts will be there for a scoping meeting."

Fehr said national experts from the lab facility the new facility could replace will be present to answer questions people might have and to talk about the activities that would go on in a new facility.

A formal meeting, where representatives from the federal government will run a program about the process that is underway, will start at 7 p.m.

"They are visiting each of the five sites for these meetings," Fehr said. "They will make an environmental impact statement and analysis about the proposed facility and how it would impact these locations - ours included - from a calendar perspective and what they plan to do."

Formal comments or questions will begin at 8 p.m., Fehr said. However, if a person wishes to formally comment or ask a question, the person would need to register in the Union from 6 to 7 p.m.

They also can submit comments directly to the Department of Homeland Security, which will accept them until Sept. 28.

Fehr said the purpose of the forum, which is open to the public, is to ask officials to consider certain issues, not to get immediate answers.

"They won't be answering the formal questions at this time, just taking them," Fehr said. "If they're technical questions, they may, but the purpose is for a public hearing. Most of the questions will require an analysis before answering them."

The forum is an opportunity for the community to come out and testify to Homeland Security personnel and to people locally, said City Commissioner Bob Strawn.

"They can express their concerns to bringing the facility here, or their interest," Strawn said. "It's an opportunity for the community to voice their support."

Strawn said he hopes people will accept this opportunity to attend and see how democracy works best, whether they are in favor or not.

"This is a huge opportunity for the university," he said. "It's very positive, but it also has a lot of other elements that people need to understand and deal with."

Prince shows no fear

Ron Prince said something four months ago that, to this day, still hasn't escaped me.

First, there was the way he said it. He spoke directly and with confidence. His voice never wavered. It sounded so perfect, so believable, that you'd think he had uttered those words before.

Then there was the look on his face. His eyes were fixed and focused. He did not blink. If this was a staring contest, he would have gone on to beat everyone in the room.

Finally, there was the way he ended it. To steal a phrase from gymnastics, one might say he stuck the landing. He punctuated his message with a sly grin, his ego and arrogance seemingly pouring out in sequence. Then again, it might have been his self-assurance.

Prince's message was not a particularly long one. In fact, it was only 12 words. But his words, to me, helped define what he is all about, and offered a glimpse into the vision he has K-State football.

And as K-State heads into its showdown with No. 14 Auburn, a game that will be played in front of a national audience on ESPN, now is as good a time as any to relive Prince's words.

The question to Prince went something like this: "Why would you schedule a road game against Auburn when you could have simply kicked dirt on a team from the Sun Belt Conference?"

Here was his response, the one that has lingered in my head for so many days, as all of us try to determine if K-State has a chance on Saturday.

"I'm one of those people that say, 'Well, what if we win?'" Prince said.

I don't suspect the quote will hang from walls in high-school gymnasiums anytime soon. Still, the message is significant. Not because he said what any coach would say, but because the way he said it would have made us all believers. That includes his players.

As game time fast approaches, Vegas sports books will not be budging from their decision to list K-State as a 13.5-point underdog. Nor will Prince's critics, who hate the idea of K-State opening the season on the road against a ranked team from a power conference, back off from their claims that Prince is jeopardizing the season.

Prince, it seems, doesn't care. He will not give in to the people who tell him he can't. He won't succumb to the pressure of being in the spotlight, either. This, after all, is what he wanted all along.

And looking back on Prince's message, that sly grin of his continues to stick out at me nearly as much as the message that preceded it. It makes me think Prince knows something we don't. Because as calculated as Prince is, would he really schedule a season opener he has no chance at winning?

While we all see Auburn as a talented football power, perhaps Prince sees the Tigers as a team that's vulnerable to an early-season loss.

It happens every year, doesn't it? Ranked teams drop early non-conference games. Whether it was K-State dropping a home game to Marshall in 2003 or Texas Christian stealing a road win at Oklahoma in 2005, we've seen this before. One could certainly argue there's no better time to pull off an upset than opening week.

Prince and his "Well, what if we win?" approach will have his players ready to compete Saturday. Then again, he won't leave them any other choice.

Because no matter how good Prince is at delivering a message, he can't send this one alone.

Tailgate temptations

Staying fit during games, celebrations can be easy

For some, the most exciting part of the school year is about to begin.

It's a time of beer, purple T-shirts and greasy food. Some people even make it into the stadium to watch the football games.

As exciting as the season might be, it's also a time when your choices can make or break your experience. Tailgating season can make even the most fitness-conscious person say, "To heck with it, I'll hit the gym hard this winter."

It doesn't have to be that way. The Peters Recreation Complex might close on game day, and greasy burgers and hot dogs might haunt you, but staying slim during football season doesn't have to be a thing of legend.

KENDALL HALL

"I would say the average person gains about five pounds from all that eating and especially drinking during football season," said Brad Flink, personal trainer at the rec. "People get into a habit of drinking excessively, and there really isn't a lot of good food to eat at a tailgate."

Any seasoned game-goer can attest to the menu available, but there are options for the concerned tailgater who wants to eat a little healthier.

"If you can, try to avoid or limit eating a ton of greasy burgers and meats, and pay attention to your trans-fats and just fatty food in general," said Kelci Peck, personal trainer and nutrition consultant at the rec.

"Another thing people can do is try to stay hydrated. Try to drink a glass of water between each beer that you drink. Each can of regular beer is about 150 calories. Doing this slows down your drinking and your calorie consumption."

Peck also said most sugary foods don't mix well with beer, so avoid an excess of those football-shaped cookies at your mom's RV.

The clever ones among us might already be thinking about banking calories. That means eating less the day before and the day after the game in order to eat whatever you want at the tailgate.

"It is bordering on bingeing," Peck said. "It's a lot harder on your system in the long run. I suggest eating normally the day before, and then you won't feel the need to go overboard when you are at the game."

If you are the type of person who needs to take matters into your own hands, then bring a veggie tray to your tailgate.

You also can take some steps to expend a few extra calories while you are at the game.

"Try parking your car a little farther away or walking to the game," Flink said. "You can also bring a football and toss it around at the tailgate — people do this all the time."

Walking around the tailgates is a great way to meet people and enjoy the atmosphere of game day.

If you are content to sit in your fold-up chair, chugging Budweiser and inhaling as many hot wings with ranch dressing as you can before stumbling into the stadium, don't be surprised when your jeans don't fit by Homecoming week.

"I would guess the average college student consumes somewhere around 6,000 calories in alcohol and food at an all-day tailgate, if not more," Peck said.

Walking and snacking on veggies can go a long way toward ensuring you at least maintain your current level of fitness this football season. Not to mention, you'll be able to flash that purple-painted six-pack well into postseason play.

Prince revels in road test

By Jeffrey Rake
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State coach Ron Prince said last year's most meaningful win wasn't the upset of then-No. 4 Texas, but the victory against Colorado, a team that finished second to last in the Big 12 North.

The reason, he said, was because it served as the Wildcats' lone road victory in 2006.

With two of K-State's first four games this year set to be played on the road — at Auburn on Saturday and at Texas on Sept. 29 — Prince said he hopes his team can find ways to compete away from home.

"You have to do that if you're going to contend for a championship and play for anything significant," Prince said. "I hope we learned something from that."

Prince said his team spent time in the offseason studying how successful road teams in college football and other sports have approached the game, adding that some venues enjoy bigger advantages than others.

Auburn's Jordan-Hare Stadium, which opened in 1939, seemed to be one of those stadiums that qualified in Prince's mind.

"The home-field advantage, although none of the fans can actually come out and tackle anybody, they can have an impact on the game," Prince said. "That's one of the things that excited me about playing this opponent — having a chance to go on the road and take some of the things that we've been trying to teach and things that we're studying and put them into place."

Ahearn Field House is a historic place where many volleyball matches have been won, and more recently, where many matches have been lost.

The Wildcats already have proven their ability to win on the road this season, going 3-0 to win the Shocker Volleyball Classic.

K-State will make its first home appearance of the season at 6 tonight as the Houston Cougars make the trip to Manhattan. The Cougars are 1-0 this season after a decisive 3-0 win over Texas-Arlington on Friday.

K-State coach Suzie Fritz said she was very pleased with her squad's success, but she said she always can find something for the team to work on.

"Our biggest priority right now is left-side location and production," Fritz said. "We want to maximize our potential at that position."

The Wildcats struggled last year, breaking even with a 7-7 record. This season the team will attempt to mimic the 2003 Wildcat team that went undefeated in Ahearn Field House.

Fritz said she does not like to compare teams she has coached but likes her present squad's potential.

"Since 2003, I think these are the strongest leaders we've had," Fritz said.

Rec Fest to showcase fitness classes

By Adam Ashmore
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Looking for a healthy way to spend your spare time?

Students can preview fitness classes and activities available at the Peters Recreation Complex at Rec Fest from 6 to 8 tonight.

Whether they come to the rec for classes, intramurals or just to socialize, students can find something to spark their interest at Rec Fest, said Erin Dawson, assistant director of fitness at the rec.

"Fitness instructors will be hosting free classes and giving free fitness assessments," Dawson said.

These classes will include pilates, cycling, BOSU and even cardio kickboxing.

Intramurals and sports clubs will also be represented. In addition to the major sports, activities like rodeo, table tennis and parachuting will be available. The Recreational Services Office will be open during the event so students can submit intramural entries.

For those who enjoy pushing their limits outside the weight room, the rec will showcase its Outdoor Rental Center. A wide range of outdoor equipment is available through the rental center, including canoes, kayaks, tents and life vests.

A student ID or facility membership is required for entrance.

HOW TO CHANGE A TIRE

Everyone should know simple steps

By Adam Ingersoll
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Most would love to go their entire lives without ever having to change a tire, but it's still something everyone should know how to do.

All too often Murphy's Law applies – if it can go wrong, it will, and usually when you are running late already.

Knowing how to change a flat tire can save significant time and money when you don't have to rely on AAA, a wrecker service, or calling up that guy who writes the how-to columns in the Collegian.

The best place to start is with preparation and forethought. It is always good to know where your spare tire and jack are.

Each vehicle varies, but these items are usually located in or under the trunk, bed or cargo area. If you're not sure, check your owner's manual. Most manuals even have a section dedicated to the subject of changing a flat tire.

1. PLACE JACK NEAR FLAT TIRE

Placing the jack properly is important to ensure a sturdy and safe workspace. There are usually designated areas or even notches on the vehicle for the top of the jack to fit. These are located on the undercarriage chassis just in front of the rear wheels and just behind the front wheels.

Also, do your best to allow the base of the jack to sit level on the ground and make sure the jack is completely vertical in every plane. Crooked jack placement could cause the vehicle to fall while you are changing the tire, which is dangerous and could damage your vehicle.

2. JACK UP VEHICLE AND REMOVE TIRE

Now begin the slow process of jacking up the vehicle. Make sure to raise it high enough to get the old tire and wheel off and the new one on.

The next step is as simple as removing the old tire and wheel and replacing it with your spare. Make sure the spare tire sits all the way to the back and hand tighten all the lug nuts. When torquing the lug nuts do so with a half turn each, moving in a star-shape until each nut is tight. This insures that each nut is tightened evenly.

3. REMOVE LUG NUTS WITH TIRE IRON

Using a tire iron, loosen all the lug nuts on the tire. This might take a bit of work if the nuts are extra-tight, corroded or both. You might have to remove a hub cap or the equivalent to access the lug nuts. Do not remove the lug nuts until the vehicle is jacked up. If the lug nuts are all the way off when the car is still on the ground, the tire could fall off and cause more damage than a flat tire.

4. SECURE TIRE AND LOWER JACK

Lower your jack, and you're done.

If your spare tire is not full size, be aware of its limitations. Most are recommended not to go over 45 mph and 100 miles. If your flat tire is not blown out and just has a hole, it can be repaired at any service shop usually for less than $10. If you use the free campus planners, there are coupons for free flat repairs.

Prince's latest album offers nothing fresh, innovative

Prince, "Planet Earth"

Album review by Mark Sibilla

It seems that all groundbreaking artists reach a point in their careers when fans and critics no longer can expect greatness from their albums. It has happened to many artists who once were seen as being ahead of their time.

For example, David Bowie has yet to release a classic album since 1980's "Scary Monsters." The Rolling Stones have not had a great album since "Tattoo You," and Prince, the subject of this review, has not released anything near the magnitude of "Purple Rain" or "Sign 'O' The Times."

Whether the musicians simply run out of creative juices or the rest of the music world catches up to innovations and sounds created by the pioneering artist, it is always a little heart-rending to see a once-great artist become merely a good one, producing albums that (hopefully) don't soil legacies the artists have built.

Prince has seen a resurgence of popularity since the release of his 2004 album, "Musicology," and his 2006 offering, "3121." Prince's most recent album and third deliberate attempt to reassert himself as a prevalent musical force, "Planet Earth," was released earlier this summer.

Where yesterday's Prince once was met with controversy regarding the material on his albums ("Purple Rain" eventually led to the use of Parental Advisory stickers on albums through the work of Tipper Gore and the Parents Music Resource Center), today's Prince meets affronts of a lesser magnitude. "Planet Earth," much to the chagrin of label executives and record producers, was given away with copies of the UK's Sunday Daily Mail on July 15, 2007.

"Planet Earth" finds Prince settling into a groove after his (somewhat) forward-thinking previous two efforts. The shortcomings of "Musicology" could be forgiven due to the album being a return to form for Prince, and "3121" had monumental tracks like the minimalist funk of "Black Sweat."

But "Planet Earth" is a tedious album with Prince bringing nothing new to the table, and the songs he does are merely reheated leftovers of superior tracks from superior albums. One knows an album is lacking when the best part about it is the hologram on the front cover that shifts between Prince's symbol and the album's proper cover.

The album opens with the title track, which can best be described as a type of R&B prog-rock. The song attempts to mimic such soul epics as Stevie Wonder's "Living for the City." But where that song had heart and restraint, "Planet Earth" is ruined by larger-than-life drum fills, grand synthesizer lines, shoddy guitar solos and clichéd lyrics.

Judging by the opening track, one couldn't be blamed for assuming "Planet Earth" is a concept album about war, the environment and how we are treating our home planet – that would have at least made the album more interesting – but by track two, it's clear this isn't the case.

"Guitar" is a fun little ditty. It's the perfect summer song – energetic, danceable, with brainless lyrics and a catchy guitar hook that's ideal for selling ringtones for Virgin Mobile. As cynical as I am about the song's marketing campaign, "Guitar" is one of the album's few (guilty) pleasures.

"Somewhere Here on Earth" is a terrible slow jam that violates just about every smooth jazz formula. The song has a soft flute counter-melody, trite little piano flourishes, a smooth but unobtrusive trumpet and even record pops to give the song that old-timey feel. It is something that I would expect John Tesh to play on his nightly radio show.

"The One U Wanna C" is an upbeat but not particularly memorable song that is a respite from the album's middle half, which is inundated with bland, uninspired slow jams (though "Mr. Goodnight," while not particularly good, at least tries something new with Prince's suave rap).

The album's highlight comes late in the game in the form of "Chelsea Rodgers," a funky rave-up that incorporates elements of gospel, Parliament/Funkadelic's spacey funk jams and '60s soul through its lively rhythm horns.

The album ends weakly with "Resolution." It is another message song in the vein of "Planet Earth," but this time it sappier and harder to endure.

By evidence of Prince's past two albums, it was possible Prince would supply an album that would be interesting and inventive, even if the album was not as great as his earlier works. But the tepid results of "Planet Earth" makes it seem as if the Purple One is just sitting on his haunches, riding the popularity of his Super Bowl performance and his recent fan resurgence. I'm glad I didn't have higher hopes the album – they would be dashed more than they already were.

Wilson hospitalized for reasons unknown

Actor Owen Wilson was hospitalized Sunday in Los Angeles. A 911 call came to the L.A. Fire Department at 11:59 A.M. Owen was admitted to St. John's Hospital in Santa Monica, Calif., and recently was moved to Cedars-Sinai Medical Center in Los Angeles.

"I respectfully ask that the media allow me to receive care and heal in private during this difficult time," Wilson said in a statement released to media Monday.

Citing medical privacy laws, the Santa Monica Police would not release any additional information.

Tabloid gossip immediately flooded the Internet yesterday. The National Enquirer reported Monday that Wilson cut both wrists and took an indeterminate amount of pills. They then reported that Wilson was discovered by a family member who summoned help.

Enrollment process quickened after computers, course cards used

By Susie Miller
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students now have to make the extra effort to make changes to their schedule instead of logging on to KATS and revising the schedule from the comfort of their own room.

With the closing of online enrollment through KATS last Sunday, students now need to fill out an add/drop slip, walk to Willard Hall and have Enrollment Services make the change. Though this requires extra effort, try to imagine standing outside in the August heat for hours in seemingly never-ending lines just to enroll.

This was the normal procedure for K-State students until fall 1966.

The following is an excerpt of an article written by Susie Miller in the Feb. 17, 1966, K-State Collegian when the then-three-day enrollment process was about to be upgraded.

COMPUTER TO SCHEDULE STATERS

Enrolling nearly 11,000 students in less than two hours next fall will replace a procedure that now takes three days to complete.

Machine enrollment, by a 1410 IBM computer, will be instituted next fall to meet a demanding need to expedite registration procedures here. The adaptation of mechanized enrollment comes after sporadic complaints by students and faculty alike to make registration less of a frustration.

K-State's enrollment figures for this fall show about a 10-percent increase over enrollment a year ago. Officials predict this jump is indicative of years to come. Machine enrollment is but a beginning of varied procedural changes that must be functional to meet the demanding needs of keeping a university mechanically solvent.

Machine enrollment will incorporate the present advisory system, after which students will mark course preference cards to be fed into the computer for scheduling. The computer plan will be instituted next spring for all students' enrollment in the fall.

In April, a student will obtain a "permit to enroll" from his dean. After selecting courses he wishes to take, the student will meet with his adviser to complete a "mark sense card." These cards, containing the student's identification, will be filled out by the student in presence of the adviser.

One card will carry all information needed for a particular course. For example, there will be only one card for a physics class - rather than separate cards for labs, recitations and lectures.

The student will be entitled to mark an alternate, selected course in the event the machine cannot make the necessary scheduling. The student will not have a choice as to the desired times or days for his classes.

Under the machine system, class meeting times will not be known until after pre-enrollment, or advisement, is completed. After all students' cards are completed by the end of July, the cards will be fed into the computer for a section count. Upperclassmen's cards will be completed in June.

This adaptation is desirable in theory because the number of sections offered will be completely dependent upon student preferences.

It will be impossible for even enrollment officials to know the time or day of a particular course offering because this information will not be known until after the student preference count.

Knowing what courses must be offered, as indicated by student desires, will aid university departments.

Presently, the number of class sections to be offered for each course in a particular department is solicited annually by enrollment officials.

The department head makes an educated guess based on past experience and expected enrollment in the department. From this all-department count, officials compile the familiar line schedule, enumerating class sections and available scheduling.

A FINAL WORD

Factory workers across the nation stormed their superiors early in the 1900s because the advent of mechanization was endangering their jobs.

After a momentary upheaval, the good ol' USA settled back into her blissful routine - accepting the fact that change was inevitable and that change is good.

Mechanization. Change. The story is being repeated here with the introduction of machine enrollment.

Labor forces early in the century were discontent and did not falter in demonstrating their disapproval to the controlling forces. Every attempt was made to voice their arguments to the men in charge.

By coming out into the open, the two forces came to an eventual understanding, and ultimately, a common goal.

It would be disheartening to think the switch to computer enrollment will be met with no disapproval. When management takes advantage of technological advances, the underlines are expected to complain.

But only logical objection is worthy. Logical argument against a proposed plan tends to strengthen the proposal and might throw light onto some areas not yet considered.

Not unlike the unskilled workers facing the ominous mechanization of their labor, students here personally are involved in this transitional period - a beginning of coping with the burden of ever-increasing enrollment. And no one knows the ins and outs of enrolling of classes better than students.

Rather than blindly attacking the inevitable, students should be aware they are of major importance and effectively could serve to strengthen and improve a program designed for their benefit.

RECRUITMENT | Men join fraternities, get involved year-round at K-State

not an up year," he said. "Our fraternity community is actually a little bit larger this year than it was the prior year. We still continue to do well, and we're still a healthy and vibrant community."

There are 25 fraternity chapters that receive advisement through Greek Affairs, Jones said. Through an administration division, Jones said the historically black and historically hispanic fraternity chapters receive their advisement through the Diversity and Dual Career Development Office. These chapters have a recruitment process different from Greek Affairs.

Jared Flott, Delta Chi recruitment chair, said Delta Chi's recruitment-week events include Earthball, a barbecue and camp out. Flott, junior in mechanical engineering, said fraternities allow men to become more involved on campus and learn about themselves.

"The friends you meet in your fraternity are the friends you're going to want to be around for the rest of your life," he said.

Fraternities at K-State recruit new members year-round, Hill said. High-school seniors sign with fraternities during the spring semester, while men enrolled in college can sign any time, he said.

Hill said early summer usually is a busy recruitment time for fraternities since they are signing men for the fall pledge classes.

"It varies from campus to campus, and that's just what we've found works best for us," Hill said of the process. "Hopefully some chapters will gain larger membership and get a few more members and also promote a positive image of the greek system."

With a large number of incoming first-generation K-State students, many do not think about the fraternity-recruitment process during their senior year in high school or freshman year in college, Jones said.

"It shows that our students are creative and willing to exercise options to find new successes," Jones said about recruitment week. "I think for us it demonstrates our commitment for all men who wish to explore a fraternity experience are given the opportunity to do so."

During its recruitment efforts Monday night, Sigma Chi members had a poker tournament with potential members. John Rees, Sig's recruitment chair, said the fraternity does year-round recruitment through informational booths and databases compiled by active members.

Rees said he encourages men to keep an open mind during the recruitment process.

"It doesn't hurt to try something out for the first time," he said. "We don't want them to get into anything they don't want to do - we're just trying to bring out the best aspects with rushees."

"Hopefully they can gain something out of it, even if they decide not to join."

FOOTBALL | Rossman listed 1st on depth chart

more at ease.

"I've been real impressed with how he's approached things recently," Prince said. "He'll be both our kickoff person and also the guy that kicks the points."

Junior Jared Parker, who seemingly has the stronger leg of the two, was believed to be the front-runner for kickoff duties.

But Prince made it clear his emphasis will be on kickoff placement rather than distance, now that kickoffs will be five yards behind last year's spot beginning this season.

"We think mechanically (Rossman) has got the right kind of stuff," Prince said.

SCHEDULING AUBURN PART OF PRINCE'S PLAN

Perhaps no coach in college football loves having an extra game on the schedule more than Prince.

"This 12th game really has impacted college football," Prince said.

Gone are the days when teams would play only 11-game seasons. And now, with the opportunity to schedule up to 12 opponents, Prince said he hopes to make the most of it.

With ESPN cameras rolling, K-State will have a chance to do more than accomplish its on-field goals. As Prince pointed out, the national television appearance will provide K-State with a chance to get its name out and market its product.

"We get the chance to go and have the Powercat and our branding opportunity national, and be able to tell the story about Kansas State," Prince said. "We're very excited about the people at ESPN and how excited they were to put this game together."

DEFENSIVE STAR CATCHES PRINCE'S EYE

Quentin Groves, Auburn's standout defensive end, must have made quite an impression on Prince.

How else can you explain Prince's willingness to compare the senior to a trio of players in the NFL in the same sentence?

"I've had a chance to coach against a lot of really good players - Shawne Merriman, Julius Peppers, Mario Williams - and this guy is their equal," Prince said.

Groves, who totaled 37 tackles and had 9.5 sacks last year, was named to the 2006 Coaches All-SEC First Team and has been named to pre-season watchlists for three different defensive trophies.

His ability to play multiple spots along the defensive line might cause some match-up problems for K-State, which enters the season with plenty of question marks along the offensive front.

"He can wreck the game by himself, just by virtue of his own talent," Prince said. "He has a lot of versatility - he can line up in a lot of different places."

TUITION | K-State has fewer class fees

tuition comparisons between K-State and KU are flawed because KU charges more class fees than K-State.

"These comparisons are less and less meaningful because here at K-State, we don't have as many fees," Shubert said.

According to the KU Web site, ku.edu, KU students pay college-specific fees ranging from $13.80 to $154 a credit hour, depending on the school, in all but two schools. K-State students pay fees in only three schools.

Engineering students pay $29 per credit hour, architecture students pay $14 a credit hour, and business students pay $15, according to the committee's tuition proposal.

Wagner said the Student Governing Board hopes to phase out the college-specific fees over the next few years, though. He said legislators were more focused on tuition rates, and K-State did not want to disturb the research process.

"We're trying to do it, and we want to do it, but we didn't want to change anything tuition-wise," Wagner said.

We've got the stories you've got to read.

K-State makes 2 'best' lists

By Monica Castro
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State recently received two recognitions for being "cutting-edge" and one of the best universities in the United States.

The university is included in Princeton Review's "Best 366 Colleges" and has been rated one of the "25 Most Cutting-Edge Schools in the Nation" by Kaplan Publishing's 2008 edition of "You Are Here: A Guide to Over 380 Colleges and Unlimited Paths to Your Future."

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said he believes K-State has earned the recognition because of its many majors and programs available for students. K-State offers more than 250 academic majors for students.

"The many organizations make Kansas State University an opportunistic school," Bosco said.

Community members voiced concerns and opinions about health-reform issues at a roundtable discussion that included Gov. Kathleen Sebelius on Tuesday.

Sebelius and members of the Kansas Health Policy Authority heard what locals had to say about health-reform options as part of the Listening Tour that will travel to 20 different cities and discuss health reform with Kansans.

They discussed such issues as obesity in children and adults, health insurance, and Medicare.

Homeland Security leads talk about defense facility

Proximity to K-State is a major factor for attracting the National Bio and Agro-Defense Facility to Manhattan, the NBAF project manager said in a public forum Tuesday.

Students and community members received information and voiced their concerns about the NBAF in the K-State Student Union.

The forum was a part of the Environmental Impact Study to be used by the Department of Homeland Security in evaluating the effect of the research facility on the local area.

These effects would include construction and operation costs on the environment, the infrastructure, socioeconomic concerns, and human health and safety, said Kevin Folk, public outreach specialist for the DHS.

Issues brought up at the meeting will partially determine EIS criteria, Folk said.

"The purpose of the scoping meeting is to determine the scope of issues related to the NBAF," said James Johnson, project manager and director for the DHS Office of National Laboratories. "We want and need your comments to form the draft EIS."

Representatives from several separate organizations expressed their support for the proposed facility.

"Our state has top research and development talent, and we've been very serious about investing and partnering with scientists and entrepreneurs," said Steve Kelly, representative from the Kansas Department of Commerce. "All of this creates an environment ideally suited for the National Bio and Agro-Defense Facility."

Several local community leaders pledged their support for the facility.

"The board of Riley County commissioners wholeheartedly supports the creation of the National Bio and Agro-Defense Facility as the best protection for the safety of the American food supply from both natural and man-made threats," said Michael Kearns, chairman of the Riley County commission.

During the public forum, students and community members had the opportunity to ask DHS officials questions about the effect the facility would have on Manhattan and make comments.

City Commissioner Bob Strawn raised concerns about the potential for the facility to put pressure on financing existing roads and other infrastructure in Manhattan.

The DHS will handle the cost of any additional infrastructure, Johnson said.

Several students and community members voiced their concerns over the potential for contamination from the diseases researched at the facility to the community outside.

One community member asked how the DHS could guarantee a disease could not be released.

Johnson responded by saying the facility will have layered security, with upwards of 50 armed guards and advanced technology and rigorous training procedures.

Another student asked if the NBAF would allow students to participate in the research.

"Proximity to the university was one of the most important criteria for coming here," Johnson said. "I fully envision taking advantage of that proximity for research."

Community members' support of the project is recognized as important by the DHS, but it is not one of the factors when determining the placement of the facility, Johnson said.

Selection process for the location of the facility is a multi-faceted process with the environmental impact study as the tip of the iceberg, Folk said.

After the initial drafting of the study, another public forum will take place at each of the potential sites. The community will then have the opportunity to ask questions and comment on the draft before it is finalized in October 2008. At that time, the DHS will announce the final selection for the host city. Construction is expected

More than 600 sprinkler heads recalled in 2001 still not replaced

By Mike Kelly
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Many of the sprinkler heads installed on the K-State campus have been recalled since 2001, Division of Facilities officials said.

Dale Boggs, facilities building maintenance associate director, said there is a total of 631 sprinkler heads installed in six university buildings that are involved in a voluntary recall.

"We are working, and we do follow all fire management safety codes," Boggs said. "People should feel that they're not in danger over this."

Application for the voluntary recall program ends Friday. If K-State university officials do not submit an application, the university will not be eligible to receive replacement heads or labor costs, according to a U.S. Consumer Product Safety May 1 press release.

Central Sprinkler Corporation, an affiliate of Tyco Fire Products, recalled its O-ring fire sprinklers on July 19, 2001. More than 35 million sprinkler heads were recalled.

The voluntary recall program, founded by the Central Sprinkler Company and the U.S. Consumer Safety Commission, came about following a 2001 lawsuit in which independent testing found that Central's O-ring sprinklers could degrade over time and affect the sprinklers' capacities, according to a Central report.

Underwriters Laboratories, the independent testing agency, found that, due to degradation from salts, water, minerals and other contaminants, some of the sprinkler heads with the O-ring seal required a higher water pressure to operate than was available in some buildings.

Under the voluntary recall, Central will provide replacement sprinkler heads free of charge to building owners who file a claim. Central also will arrange and pay for the labor needed to install the replacement sprinklers by using either its own crews or by contracting local help.

Edward Heptig, director of facilities maintenance, said he notified Boggs of the recall four weeks ago. Heptig said that he was aware of the initial recall and had the former head of the university plumbing shop search for the sprinklers.

"I recall them going to the stadium project; whether they looked at every building I can't recall," Heptig said. "Supposedly, we were clear."

This summer, a campus safety inspection revealed the presence of the recalled sprinkler heads, Heptig said.

"Campus safety acknowledged that there were a few sprinklers on the recall, so we did a complete survey," he said.

Boggs said he then worked with university plumbing shop employees, scouring the entire campus for the recalled sprinkler heads.

"We did do a complete survey of campus, and we have the documentation and have identification for every sprinkler," Boggs said.

Boggs and Heptig both said the paperwork has been filled out and will be sent before Friday's deadline. Boggs said that he worked through the weekend to ensure the deadline would be met.

Due to the large number of sprinkler heads that will be replaced nationwide, Central officials said they anticipate the replacement program will take place over a period of years. They said that heads would be replaced with priority based on the sprinklers' age, condition and population affected.

tive, said that classrooms are among the "high priority" replacement projects. However, she could not give a tentative time frame for the projects.

Heptig said he expects the sprinklers to be removed with relative haste.

"I would think though the liability will be back on them, so they would change them quite quickly," Heptig said.

While some sprinkler heads may currently be inactive, they are not the only measure of fire prevention on campus. Campus safety representatives said that smoke alarms and fire extinguishers are up-to-date in all campus buildings. Boggs said that, due to their nature, sprinklers would not be a life-saving entity during a fire.

"It would have to get up to 125 or 165 degrees for the sprinklers to turn on," Boggs said. "A person couldn't be in there."

PAGEANT CONTESTANT FLUBS UP

A Miss Teen USA contestant is receiving attention for her confused, mangled response to a pageant question about Americans' knowledge of geography.

Lauren Caitlin Upton, 18, got a chance to redeem herself Tuesday on NBC's "Today" show when she was again asked why one-fifth of Americans cannot locate the United States on a map.

"I would love to re-answer that question," the Miss Teen South Carolina said. "Well personally, my friends and I, we know exactly where the United States is on our map. I don't know anyone else who doesn't."

And if the statistics are correct, I believe there should be more emphasis on geography."

That was much better than her previous response, a rambling answer that included references to "U.S. Americans" and mentions of South Africa and "the Iraq."

A YouTube video of the Friday pageant has drawn a couple million hits and thousands of comments, many with harsh remarks for the teen, who plans to attend Appalachian State University.

Upton was taking her flubbed answer — and the attention — in stride.

"Everything did come at me at once. I was overwhelmed and I made a mistake. Everybody makes a mistake. I'm human," she said Tuesday.

MISSISSIPPI THE FATTEST STATE

Mississippians need to skip the gravy, say no to the fried pickles and start taking brisk walks to fight an epidemic of obesity, experts say. According to a new study, this Deep South state is the fattest in the nation.

It also became the first state to crack the 30-percent barrier for adults considered obese, with West Virginia and Alabama just behind, according to the Trust for America's Health, a research group that focuses on disease prevention.

Aside from being a butt of late-night talk show jokes, the obesity epidemic has serious implications for public policy.

If current trends hold, these states could face enormous increases in the already significant costs of treating diabetes, heart disease and other ailments related to extra weight. The leanest state in the rankings was Colorado, with an obesity rate projected at a much lower 17.6 percent.

"We've got a long way to go. We love fried chicken and fried anything and all the grease and fatback we can get in Mississippi," said Democratic state Rep. Steve Holland, chairman of the Public Health Committee.

Poverty and obesity often go hand in hand, doctors say, because poor families stretch their budgets by buying cheaper, processed foods that have higher fat content and lower nutritional value.

Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee — a self-described "recovering foodaholic" who lost 110 pounds and tried to put his entire state on a wellness plan — explained during a Southern Governors' Association meeting last weekend that there are historical reasons poor people often fry their foods: It's an inexpensive way to increase the calories and feed a family.

Lack of exercise is a huge factor in obesity rates. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention found last year that more than 22 percent of Americans did not engage in any physical activity in the past month. The percentage is greater than 30 percent in four states: Mississippi, Louisiana, Kentucky and Tennessee.

Fraternity earns 1st runner-up prize at national convention

By Emily Sterk
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's Kappa Tau chapter of Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity received first runner-up at the 101st Alpha Phi Alpha National Convention in Orlando, Fla., Aug. 9-14.

The team took first place at its first appearance at the Alpha Phi Alpha regional scholars' bowl tournament.

The team members represented the Midwest region at the national competition, said Brandon Clark, coach and chapter adviser.

Jonathan Scott, sophomore in business administration, said he decided to join the scholars' bowl team because last year he answered questions as an audience member.

"I saw other teams, and I thought the questions were easy, since I was answering them in my seat," Scott said.

Careem Gladney, Alpha Phi Alpha president and junior in accounting, was an alternate at the regional competition.

After several members could not compete at nationals, Gladney was voted in as team captain.

Other team members included Adrian Carter, junior in business administration, and David Griffin Jr., junior in print journalism.

The team had a two-week period to prepare for the competition. They prepared with questions involving politics, religion, current issues, sports and fraternity history. Griffin said "retaining the information and embedding it into their brains" were some of several challenges team members encountered during competition preparation.

Gladney said the strategy to their success was dividing the questions into five parts, with each member getting a section to study.

After four days, team members would trade sections, Gladney said.

Griffin said bringing the title back, competing nationally because there are a lot of chapters around the nation and getting the Alpha Phi Alpha name known was the greatest part of the bowl, which started about 10 years ago.

"Everyone was pretty excited," Carter said about his team members. "It was the first time Kappa Tau won something like this."

Alpha Phi Alpha members value scholarship, Clark said.

"It is a way to showcase college brothers in their knowledge," Clark said.

Gladney said he appreciated the recognition the scholars' bowl gave to the chapter and K-State.

"(It's) knowing that academics is still the foundation of our organization," Gladney said. "They wanted to do something for brothers academically."

Squad receives paid bid to competition

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For most students, spring break is a time to relax, take a break from school and get away with friends. However, it is not the same for the K-State cheer squad.

The team, a perennial contestant at the National Cheerleaders Association competition, usually spends its break hard at work getting ready for the April event, and sometimes, worrying about paying to get there. This year the team has a few less things to worry about after winning a paid bid to the annual championship competition.

Jodie Mayes, member of the cheer squad and junior in marketing, said the system for receiving a paid bid has changed from the way it worked last year.

In previous years, teams were allowed to send in taped performances of their routines for the judges to watch, but that changed this season, she said.

"This year they encouraged the college teams to go to camp by saying we are not going to have video qualifications anymore," Mayes said. "You have to be a part of camp to receive a bid."

Mayes said the team received the paid bid after attending a regional camp at K-State last year.

At the regional event, the team took first place in both areas of the competition.

"There are two parts to each competition," Mayes said. "Game day, which we won, and spirit rally, which we won as well."

The game-day portion consists of what the squad performs during game days, and the goal of the contest is to get the crowd involved in the cheer. The spirit rally is similar, but less associated with the game-day routines, she said.

In early April 2008, the nationally ranked cheerleading squad will go to Daytona Beach, Fla., and attempt to retain their ranking as one of the nation's premier squads.

While the team has a confirmed spot to compete, the K-State roster for the nationals team is not yet decided.

Kelli Lair, member of the cheer squad and senior in secondary education, said many factors must be considered when choosing which cheer squad members will compete, including how well the squad works together.

The number of men on the team also is important, said Madison King, member of the cheer squad and junior in hotel and restaurant management.

"It will most likely be four guys and 16 girls," King said. "It depends on how many guys we can get and how qualified they are."

In addition to the national ranking the squad received, four of the squad members were named All-Americans.

There is an All-America tryout process which those interested in attaining the title must participate in, Mayes said.

"You have to have all-around elite skills to become an All-American," she said.

While the team is excited for nationals, Lair said its main focus now is the upcoming football season. With a game every Saturday, the team stays busy practicing to make sure it is ready for each game.

"Sports are our main focus," Lair said. "That's what we're here for, first and foremost. Nationals is just the icing on top of the cake."

TO THE POINT

Faster response necessary

The K-State community will dodge a huge bullet by applying for the voluntary recall program this week to replace the more than 600 recalled sprinkler heads on campus.

We feel that it is about time.

Without this application, the university would be liable to replace and install the sprinkler heads with their own funds.

With the millions of dollars of deferred maintenance already scattered throughout campus, additional debt is not what the university needs.

More importantly, without applying for the recall, the university is taking on an enormous amount of potential liability should a fire devastate any part of campus.

Not only are ineffective sprinkler heads on campus dangerous, they also put K-State at risk of losing the millions of dollars of equipment housed in buildings like Hale Library and the College of Veterinary Medicine.

Though the recall was technically voluntary, we believe the Division of Facilities should make decisions with the university's best interest in mind in a more timely manner.

Waiting for more than six years until the last possible chance to receive free replacements and labor through the recall was irresponsible and unwise.

In the future, we hope similar situations would be handled in a more timely fashion with the safety and bank accounts of K-State students in mind.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

It has been really hot these past few weeks. Some believe it is hot because the climate fluctuates throughout the year — hotter during the summer, colder during the winter.

However, many individuals believe the cause of this extreme heat we are experiencing can be summed up in two words: global warming.

One problem with the latter argument is global warming actually is not global at all. According to a study by Lubos Motl, a Harvard physicist, global warming is not affecting the whole world.

The study showed the southern hemisphere has been warming 0.05 degrees Celsius a decade since 1970. The physicist has stated the measuring station at the South Pole actually has shown a distinctive cooling trend in temperatures.

Even with that fact presented, many people who believe in the man-made myth that is global warming still argue the temperatures we are experiencing are all-time highs.

However, Christopher Horner, a senior fellow at the Competitive Enterprise and an acknowledged expert on global warming legislation and regulation, does not believe the argument is quite accurate.

"Evidence suggests it is currently colder than it was during the well-established Medieval Warm Period," Horner said.

Even without air conditioned buildings, homes and cars, the peasants and knights during the Medieval Warm Period somehow dealt with the heat. Instead of crying "armageddon" to the entire world, they went out and made the best of it. Horner said this time was considered a golden age for agriculture, innovation and lifespan.

The earth has hardly been warming over the past years. The Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change announced that over the span of the 20th century, the global average surface temperature increased about 0.6 degrees Celsius.

Sometimes a few facts are not enough to sway a global warming fanatic. People still will argue in support of the global-warming theory by saying the glaciers are melting.

Here's a question: what happens when you leave an ice cube out on your counter? It melts. Ice tends to melt when it is in an environment above freezing. To say an ice glacier is melting is not an eye opening, jaw-dropping discovery. Rather, it is merely a guess.

It is not a good guess, either. While some glaciers have been melting, scientists have proven other glaciers are growing (a process known as calving), Horner said.

So if the melting of a glacier is proof of global warming, then the calving of another must be proof of a global cooling.

Always forgotten by the eco-freaks is back in the 1970s, environmentalists were running around telling everyone to prepare for global cooling. In the April 28, 1975, issue of Newsweek magazine, an article ran giving a scientific analysis of the then-impending disaster of global cooling, complete with weather patterns and a chart of the "average temperature change."

The article hypothesized this global catastrophe would create a shorter summer growing season which would then lead to worldwide starvation.

That obviously did not occur.

Do not let the global warming fanatics try to convince you otherwise.

Parents should take classes

As U.S. citizens, we are required to have a driver's license to operate a car, a license to open a business and a license to hold a peaceful protest.

However, any human being can produce a baby without any restrictions or parent licenses.

If anyone goes to Wal-Mart on a Saturday morning, there are always classic cases of child abuse; sometimes it is only verbal; other times it can be physical.

Set to air on Sept. 19, CBS's "Kid Nation" already has caused controversy over child abuse and negligence.

"Kid Nation" takes 40 children from ages 8 to 15 and sticks them in a ghost town in New Mexico, away from any adult supervision.

Parents are now outraged by the accounts of the child abuse and neglect occurring on the show, like children drinking bleach or being burned by hot oil and grease.

A hard reality for people to grasp is that these events don't just happen on reality TV shows but are frequent occurrences in homes here in the United States.

According to a McLean Hospital Brain Imaging Center study done in July 2000, during the adolescent years, there is much less activity in the frontal lobe — the place in the brain that makes logical decisions — as children rather than adults. The researchers said adults spend more time thinking decisions out than young children.

K-State offers "Introduction to Human Development", a class that uses novel, "High Risk" by Dr. Ken Magid and Carole A. McKelvey.

According to a book review of "High Risk" by John A. Speyer, it "is all about the making of a psychopath and warns that in the future our society will have greater and greater numbers of such individuals preying on the rest of the population."

There is a reason why parents have a responsibility to their kids to keep them out of trouble; they simply are not able to reasonably think it out themselves.

If the United States required a minimal number of parenting classes, taught by private companies working closely with the government, there could be a decrease in the number of rapes, murders and thefts.

Essentially, over so many generations of imperfect people, our nation's parenting skills must be imperfect. We rely on parenting of centuries ago, and in a changing world we cannot always rely on tradition.

We study the history of our world and put the past into perspective so we do not repeat the past, yet society has not done this process with our family systems.

As former children ourselves, we are the product of the amount of effort our parents put out to raise us. Some of us grew up in well-managed, happy homes, while others were not so lucky.

Children learn how to raise their children from parents. Sometimes a person or group just has to break the cycle.

If we all learn a few things about how to discuss certain nerve-wracking adolescent issues, our world would be a much different place.

The best course of action when expecting or raising children is to make sure we don't pass on shortcomings. If we bring our children into this world wanting the best for them, we must make sure we send messages of love and happiness. Everyone deserves to come into this world with a fair shot at a happy life.

Dreaded past

Hairstyle has religious history dating back to 1930s

By Mark Sibilla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Dreadlocks are a distinct hairstyle composed of matted ropes of hair. The term "dreadlock" originally comes from the Rastafari movement, but people of various cultures throughout history have worn dreadlocks.

A DETAILED HISTORY

In the introduction Alice Walker wrote for the book "Dreads" by Francesco Mastilia and Alfonso Pagano, Walker details the emergence and history of dreadlocks. To fully understand the history of dreadlocks and their start in the Western world, one should be familiarized with the Rastafarian religion, which has its roots in the Universal Negro Improvement Association formed by Jamaican-born black nationalist leader, Marcus Garvey, in the late 1920s.

According to Walker, Garvey was viewed as a political proponent of black equality. But in his native Jamaica, Garvey was somewhat of a prophet — the one appointed to announce the coming of a messiah who would be an Abyssinian king descended from David. In 1930, when Ras Tafari, an African prince, was crowned Emperor Haile Selassie I of Ethiopia, many considered the prophecy fulfilled.

In 1935, Italy invaded Ethiopia and forced the emperor from his throne. Many of the emperor's followers swore not to cut their locks until Selassie, "the lion of Judah," was reinstated to the throne. Walker claims this is the birth of Rastafarianism.

The tenets of Rastafarianism spread to Jamaica — which was a slave colony under British occupation beginning in 1655 — through Garvey, who denounced the British regime as Babylonian, promoted repatriation to Africa and proclaimed the divinity of an Ethiopian emperor, Walker said.

British imperialists who felt threatened by this new ideology persecuted Rastas heavily. As Walker puts it, "In the Rastaman's lion's mane of locks, British Imperialists saw their worst nightmare manifest — the African primitive, unleashed."

One of the attributions to the word dreadlock is the pejorative way in which imperialists used the word to describe the locks of hair: dread-ful. But, according to Walker, Rastafari view their hair as a holy connection between a Rasta and their creator.

"Like the Nazirites of biblical days, Rastafarians regard themselves as 'the separate ones,'" Walker said. "Dedicated to pure and holy living, Nazirites vowed not to cut their hair, and so were recognized by the mass knotted locks upon their heads."

Reggae musicians, like Bob Marley, are heavily associated with dreadlocks and increasing their popularity in North America.

A LOCAL CONNECTION

Clay Cheney, Manhattan resident and dread head, said he first listened to reggae music around the age of five. He said reggae music in particular had a long-lasting effect on him.

"The first reggae song I heard was 'Electric Avenue' by Eddy Grant, and there was just something about the beat and the nature of the song that really spoke to me," Cheney said.

He said it was about this time when he first saw dreadlocks, which immediately intrigued him.

"When I first saw dreadlocks, I thought, 'I want my hair to do that; I wish that it could,'" he said. "I always had long hair growing up, and my hair was always something for which I was known. Little did I know that as I grew and matured, my hair would get coarse and become perfect for dreadlocks."

Cheney said the last haircut he received was on Sept. 12, 2001.

"I got a very short hair cut, and it just looked terrible on me," he said.

He first dreaded his hair about a year-and-a-half later, in January 2003, Cheney added. Growing dreads requires a lot of patience and is a huge commitment. Cheney highly recommends the Web site www.dreadheadhq.com for all products and questions related to dreadlocks.

"It's tough to get started," Cheney said. "It hurts to backcomb, and you definitely need a good friend or stylist to help you complete them. Making dreads really goes against everything they say to do to your hair, but it really is a completely natural process — your hair would naturally dread if left to its own devices."

The decision to grow dreadlocks was both an aesthetic and spiritual journey for Cheney, he said. In addition to wanting dreadlocks because of the way they looked, Cheney said reggae music and the ideals of Rastafarianism were another major contributor to his decision to dread his hair.

"I don't consider myself a follower of the Rastafarian religion, but there are many messages with which I agree," Cheney said. "The overall message of the music is that of positivity and good vibrations; it is about creating brotherhood and maintaining a sense of personal peace and sharing that with others."

Cheney says he does not regret the decision to grow his dreadlocks.

"I'd have to say that the response to my dreads has been about 99.9 percent positive," Cheney said. "I get good attention and reception from people all the time. It's the best decision I ever made."

"Ziggy Marley has said that it takes years to develop into the person you want to be. I'm in a good place in my life right now, and my dreadlocks have been a huge part of those positive developments in my life."

HOW TO DREAD

1. Acquire necessary materials: A friend, a dreading comb (a comb with strong bristles — preferably metal — that are close together), rubberbands, hair clips, a jar of dread wax, residue-free shampoo, a bottle of locking accelerator, Lock Peppa.

2. Wash hair in a shampoo that will not leave a residue.

3. Section the hair. Start by parting the hair in the middle and clip one side to get it out of the way. Take the unclipped half and section it into squares; each square should have about the same amount of hair. Put a rubberband on each section. Try to keep each bundle about the same size (about one-half inch in diameter) and don't leave too much room in between each section of hair.

4. Backcomb. It is similar to teasing the hair. Take the comb and stick it in between strands and comb the hair toward the scalp, letting a hair or two slip loose with each stroke forward. The loose hairs get pushed forward and begin to form dreads. Keep the hair closest to the scalp as tight as possible to allow for new hair to dread as it grows.

5. Wax. Begin waxing the roots right after the rubberband. Apply the wax slowly and evenly. The dread should have enough wax that you can feel it, but not so much that you can see it.

6. Enjoy the fun and responsibility of owning and maintaining your new dreadlocks.

Johansson movie a predictable yet lighthearted, enjoyable summer film

"The Nanny Diaries"

★★★★☆

Movie review by Brenden Praeger

As far as predictable, lighthearted summer films go, "The Nanny Diaries" is no masterpiece, but it is far from the bottom of the barrel.

Directors Shari Springer Berman and Robert Pulcini have followed their previous film, "American Splendor," with a more commercial entry. Scarlett Johansson stars as Annie Braddock, a recent college graduate facing a career crisis. After a random meeting with a New York socialite and her child in Central Park, she accepts a job as a nanny.

Predictably, it is not the dream job she hoped for. The child is a spoiled brat, the mother (Laura Linney) is self-obsessed and demanding, and the father (Paul Giamatti) only returns from business trips to berate his family and sexually harass his servants.

Most critics have taken the easy road and simply compared it to last summer's "The Devil Wears Prada." The comparison is not without merit, but numerous comic devices make "The Nanny Diaries" more like a sitcom and less like a serious memoir.

Johansson's narration presents the inhabitants of New York's Upper East side in the context of an anthropological field study. In a series of museum exhibits, we see the fathers playing golf and receiving lap dances, the mothers lounging at the spa and getting nose jobs, while the children remain safe and sound with an ethnically diverse collection of nannies.

Throw in a few overbearing "Mary Poppins" references, anonymous titles like "Harvard Hottie" for key characters and a cathartic confrontation with a nanny cam hidden inside a teddy bear, and the film becomes lighthearted enough to please a wide audience.

Giamatti and Linney turn in predictably excellent performances, though their characters are decidedly one-dimensional. Johansson, whose film credits include numerous hits and misses, is likable without being too whiny.

Characters in this type of film have a habit of feeling a bit too sorry for themselves, but Johansson plays it cool without coming off as disengaged.

If you are willing to lower your expectations to the level of chick-flick mindlessness, you could do a lot worse.

Don Vito arrested for violating bail

Vincent "Don Vito" Margera, the uncle from the MTV show "Viva La Bam" was charged with 12 felony counts of violating bail, stemming from an arrest last year in Colorado.

Margera was arrested for fondling three girls at a Colorado mall, and all three girls were between the ages of 13 and 15.

After pleading guilty to all charges, Margera was released on $50,000 bail.

Terms of his bail included no use of drugs or alcohol and zero contact with children.

It is unclear at this time what Margera did to violate parole.

Newcomer will make impression

It was a simple question, really. Nothing out of the ordinary.

After seeing that junior-college transfer Deon Murphy had earned a No. 1 spot on the depth chart at wide receiver, kickoff returner and punt returner, a reporter asked coach Ron Prince something to the effect of, "What have you seen from Deon Murphy that has impressed you?"

NICK DUNN

The answer, though, is what got everybody in the room going.

"Probably Deon's rap in the rookie show the other day," Prince said. "I had no idea he was such a talented lyricist. His performance was not G-rated."

What followed was a three-minute description of a player who has been with the team for less than a month, but has obviously taken no time to make an impression — on the field, sure, but especially off it.

After Prince was finished, you could tell every reporter in the room was thinking to themselves, "I have to talk to that Deon Murphy kid."

There's always that player on the team that reporters love to talk to — the guy who doesn't give the cliché responses, or even if he does, he somehow makes them sound more interesting.

Quintin Echols filled that role last season.

With so many players on the team, there's bound to be a wide spectrum of personalities. Some are bland. Some are loud. Some speak quietly, showing their nerves. Some brim with confidence.

Deon Murphy is in a class by himself.

"It'll be hard for any of us to love Deon more than Deon loves Deon," Prince said.

But he didn't mean it as an insult at all. And after talking with Murphy, it was easy to see what he meant. Reporters hovered around Murphy for a good 20 minutes, and whether he was naming himself as one of his favorite rap artists or talking about his lifelong friendship with St. Louis Rams' return specialist Dante Hall, he clearly stole the show.

For some reason, we're fascinated with athletes like Murphy. Whether it's Charles Barkley saying he doesn't care what people think because people are stupid, or Chad Johnson going on national television to make a fool of himself, there's something about athletes who aren't afraid to say what they think.

Part of it, obviously, is fun. It's more entertaining to talk to someone who's, well, entertaining. But that's not all of it. There's something else.

What is most compelling about these types of players is that they seem to be more real about what they say. They're not "giving 110 percent" or "doing their best to help the team win." They're just people, saying how they feel.

A lot of times it can lead to some trouble, but usually it turns out OK. Even a guy like Barkley has managed to keep a relatively good reputation despite saying some pretty stupid things over the years.

Now, I realize it's unrealistic to think every athlete could be a character. Each player is different. If I were an athlete, I'd probably be as boring as possible with the media just to stay out of the spotlight.

The stories on Murphy in the coming days and weeks are inevitable. He's just too good to pass up. But it was one answer in particular that really grabbed my attention. Asked what he thought of playing in an environment like Auburn, Murphy didn't say it was "just another game" or "they'll have to come together as a team." He said he'd be nervous.

That's it. Nervous.

He was the only player I heard admit to that.

"I don't think of myself as giving interviews. I just have conversations. That gets me in trouble." — Charles Barkley Even Michael Beasley couldn't steal the spotlight from the K-State volleyball team Tuesday night.

After a meet-and-greet session with Beasley and the rest of the men's basketball team, K-State fans watched the volleyball squad knock off Houston 3-0 (30-18, 30-16, 30-23) to improve to 4-0 on the season.

In game one, the Wildcats came out swinging. The squad marked its highest kill total of the match, with 18 on .306 hitting.

Coach Suzie Fritz said solid serving was the biggest factor in the match for the Wildcats.

"I thought we were a more aggressive serving team," Fritz said. "I thought we won the serve and pass battle. I thought we handled little details a little bit better than they did."

Game two featured high-percentage hitting for the Wildcats, who pounded 16 kills on 23 attacks with just two errors. The 30-16 win was K-State's largest margin of victory in the match.

The pressure was on the Cougars in game three, with just one game separating them from their first loss of the season. Houston found itself with an early lead against the Wildcats. The Cougars' sophomore middle-blocker Erin Rice could be heard from the floor yelling at her team.

"We have to have this game," Rice said. The Cougars were closing in on a win until senior libero Angie Lastra stole the momentum. Lastra dove into the mats on the sideline for a dig, and K-State went on to win 30-22.

"It was exciting," Lastra said. "It felt really good when it was over."

Lastra finished the match with 18 digs to lead the team. She said she was pleased to win but is now looking forward.

Rec Fest showcases available fitness options

Students got answers to their fitness questions and a good workout at Tuesday night's Rec Fest.

Trainers, intramural representatives and wellness experts were out in full force recruiting and educating students on the programs offered at the Peters Recreation Complex.

Those seeking an intense cardiovascular and toning workout were able to learn more about the rec's kickboxing, BOSU and cycling sessions.

"Quick cardio bursts, core toning, and of course, fun can be expected from the BOSU sessions," said Stacy Keck, fitness instructor and junior in kinesiology.

Students who needed a little motivation to intensify their workouts had the chance to participate in instructor-led cycling classes.

"Cycling classes can really help a student tailor their abilities and can help a student have a more intense workout than if they were on their own," said cycling class leader Gerald Hart.

Rec Fest attendees also could learn more about the PAC-CATS program, which helps students achieve health and wellness through education and assessments.

PAC-CATS stands for Personal Assessment Challenge-Choosing Activities for Today's Success.

"PAC-CATS gives students an idea where they stand within the standards of the American Health Association," said PAC-CATS representative Georgette Miller. "Students, especially underclassmen can have trouble staying healthy and fit when they venture out on their own. PAC-CATS can help."

One of the several club sports represented Tuesday night was women's rugby.

Heather Deaver, junior in mechanical engineering, said the team is open to players of all experience levels.

"We are always recruiting and looking for new players," she said. "It is the ultimate team game — 15 people all have each other's back."

Matt Smith, freshman in business, said Rec Fest was a good opportunity to learn about the diverse programs and recreational activities available at the rec.

"There were services I did not even know existed that really interested me," Smith said.

Chiefs trim roster as season nears

Kevin Sampson, a former spot starter at offensive tackle whose career has been hampered by injuries, is one of nine players who have been released by the Kansas City Chiefs ahead of the NFL's first mandatory cut-down deadline.

Teams were required to trim their rosters to 75 by 3 p.m. Tuesday.

Sampson played in 16 games, starting seven, in three years with the Chiefs. His 2006 season ended early when he had back surgery in December.

Kansas City also released tackles George Batiste and Ramiro Pruneda, cornerbacks Marcus Maxey and Michael Bragg, defensive end Chris Harris, tight end Mike Pinkard and wide receivers Titus Ryan and Brent Little.

The Chiefs terminated the contract of wide receiver Rod Gardner and placed four players — guard Chris Bober, fullback Greg Hanoian, linebacker David Hicks and wide receiver Maurice Price — on injured reserve.

Commission confers about urban sprawl

By Andy Heintz
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan City Commission and the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board met to discuss growth and development issues Tuesday evening.

The two groups discussed if the comprehensive plan previously agreed upon was still suitable to handle the rapid growth in the Manhattan community.

MUAPB Chair Stephanie Rolley stressed the need for the plan to support the Manhattan community in a long-term range.

"We have an obligation to create neighborhoods that people want to live in now and people will want to live in 20 years from now," Rolley said.

City Commissioner Jim Sherow said he was not satisfied with the comprehensive plan.

Sherow said the plan did not do enough to limit urban sprawl and protect the environment. Sherow pushed for a plan where the development would start in the center of the city and built out from there.

"A city is only as strong as its core," Sherow said.

The two groups and members of the general public debated the inherent risks that would result from further development near Wildcat Creek.

Rolley said she believes more studies need to be done to try and figure out the effects of further development near Wildcat Creek.

"Wildcat Creek is different than it was 10 years ago," she said. "It has a lot more water than it used to."

City Commissioner Bob Strawn said his biggest concern is understanding the risk of flooding if development around the creek continues.

Commission members have been concerned with the subject of flooding in Manhattan for many years. They have requested funds from the federal government for levy studies, but the federal government has not approved the funding.

Commissioners also talked about plans for acquiring land for small parks. City Commissioner Bruce Snead emphasized the need to acquire land as soon as possible.

"We need to be getting land and getting it now," Snead said. "If we don't, we will never get it."

Vet Med College makes technological advances

By Hannah Blick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The College of Veterinary Medicine at K-State is taking steps to ensure its place in today's fast-paced technological world.

Dr. Ralph Richardson, dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine, said in addition to the new paperless curriculum the college is implementing this year, there have been several other technological advances in the college over the last few years.

For example, more than a decade ago, the College of Veterinary Medicine converted its billing information from paper to a more advanced computerized system, Richardson said.

This improved the accountability and responsibility of the system and also showed the instructors what it takes to run a business, he said.

More recently, the college updated its software to allow more freedom between the classroom and the field.

Researchers in the field can send in a biopsy to the pathologists in the lab, who then can read it under a microscope and diagnose the problem.

As soon as the report on the sample is completed and filed, pathologists can place the information on the Internet for researchers in the field to work with, Richardson said.

When these same field researchers want to communicate with students in the classroom, they now can do so through the new Polycom system installed in several classrooms and lecture halls, Richardson said.

He said Polycom is a system that uses digital imagery for communication between those in the field and those in the classroom. Professors also have the capability to attend virtual conferences via Polycom.

"We had one professor attend a conference last month through Polycom," Richardson said. "The conference was held in Canada, and she was unable to go, but she still received all the information she needed without ever leaving."

Technology can assist professors in other ways as well.

Muthu Chengappa, director and professor of diagnostic medicine and pathobiology, conducts studies concerning abnormal body functions and changes. He said he has seen new technology appear over the last several years to complement professors' work and is excited to see more.

"I work to help identify diseases and their causes, so I would like to see more technology to help the researchers in the department as well as the doctors," Chengappa said.

Digital radiography also has made its way into the College of Veterinary Medicine, Richardson said. It has been installed in both the K-State campus' teaching hospital as well as their satellite teaching hospital in Omaha, Neb.

This allows radiologists to interpret X-ray images sent from Omaha and diagnose the problem more quickly, he said.

Richardson attended a conference more than one year ago where several new teaching methods were demonstrated. Models for teaching anatomy and surgery included stuffed animals and latex models, he said.

In London, England, veterinary surgeon Sarah Baillie of the Royal Veterinary College has used haptic technology to develop a virtual image of a cow for her students to operate on, according to CNN's Web site.

Haptic technology is designed to give students a hands-on approach using touch perception and feedback while still maintaining a realistic feel and shape, according to the Web site.

While this technology is not yet available in the United States, we should not be too quick to rule it out.

"I think there will always be advances in technology that will involve virtual imaging and enhancements in software," Richardson said, "but I feel these are simply tools, and when used appropriately may enhance learning. 'Are they effective?' still remains to be seen."

FROM THE PRESIDENT

Wagner, Peele feedback on new SGA programs

Welcome back – I hope everyone had a relaxing summer break and an easy transition into the first week of classes.

I would like to take this opportunity to discuss a few initiatives SGA is tackling this year.

We will pilot the Good Neighbors Program to promote better relationships between students and permanent residents. There will be events including a Call Hall ice cream social, as well as a neighborhood clean-up day in certain areas surrounding campus. Student population continues to grow, and often we find ourselves living right next to a family or elderly couple. This program will encourage interaction with the people we live near, and hopefully will create a greater sense of community.

Another development under way this year will be the Financial Planning Center. This would be a free service for students who wish to receive financial planning advice. If you would like to share your ideas about this center on campus, please contact us.

This semester, we also are creating a "Dead Week" committee. This group will create interaction between faculty and students to provide insight on what needs to be done to make "Dead Week" more effective for K-State's students and staff.

Vice President Lydia Peele and I will be available for questions, comments or concerns each Monday from 5-5:20 p.m. on 91.9 KSDB-FM campus radio. Anyone may call the request line at (785) 532-0919 to speak with us about SGA or campus issues. If you have a concern you would like us to discuss, you can also e-mail it to trksu@gmail.com.

Lastly, please look for this column each week, which will now appear in the Wednesday edition of the K-State Collegian.

Get excited for the game against Auburn this Saturday. Go Cats!

MATT WAGNER

GARDEN PARTY

Joslyn Brown | COLLEGIAN

During the annual College of Agriculture watermelon feed, Richard Mattson, professor of horticulture forestry and recreation, discusses the benefits of the K-State chapter of the American Horticultural Therapy Association, with Elisa Cardwell, senior in horticulture therapy. The club was one of many with tables set up at the event to promote and recruit to members of the College of Agriculture. The watermelon feed took place at 6:15 p.m. Tuesday outside Weber Arena.

community, said Marci Nielson, executive director of the KHPA.

"Input from Kansans is critical to any health-reform efforts," Nielson said in a media release. "As we develop health-reform options over the next several months, we need to listen to the concerns and suggestions of consumers, businesses and providers all across the state."

"We want to know what aspects of our current health system are working and then strengthen and build on them. But we also want to know the difficulties that Kansans have in seeking access to affordable health care and what the authority can do to help."

The KHPA is a health care agency created through legislation in 2005 and directed by members appointed by the governor.

"KHPA was created to develop and maintain a coordinated health-policy agenda to improve the health of all Kansans," according to a brochure about the agency.

Nielson, who attended the discussion, said it is important that people understand what health reform means.

"We're trying to look beyond what the normal debate might be about," she said. "Everyone thinks health reform in Kansas is health-insurance reform, and we really want to look more broadly - as the governor said, 'more strategically' - in the long run, again trying to improve our health status."

The event was held at the Flint Hills Community Clinic, a volunteer-based organization dedicated to providing free health care to members of the community, according to an FHCC brochure.

One of the issues discussed was the obesity rates in Kansas.

"Upwards of 60 percent of Kansas adults are either obese or overweight," Nielsen said.

She said these numbers were from 2003, and the number could be higher.

Joe Schlageck, medical director of the FHCC, said that one of the biggest problems with obesity is the amount of pop and junk food consumed.

"Pop is so dirt cheap," Schlageck said. "And it's a free way of bringing people into the QuikTrips and everywhere else to buy all the rest of the junk food that they have."

Sebelius said she hoped parents could help with child obesity by telling the public schools to get rid of vending machines and making physical education a requirement.

The group also discussed health insurance, especially for children.

"Children Health Insurance Program of America is set to expire on the 30th of September," Nielson said. "It insures about three million children currently, about 40,000 Kansas children."

Nielson urged people to try to get the program renewed.

"We want to make sure we don't take a big step backwards," she said. "It is a critical program, not only here in Kansas, but around the country."

Sebelius thanked those in attendance and stressed the importance of communication between the state and local levels of government.

"Input from those of you who are on the front line, who really see this not just as some theoretical conversation but who are people who are struggling day to day, is enormously helpful when (government officials) are making the decisions about how to use your tax dollars," Sebelius said.

Meghan Finnegan, administrative coordinator of the FHCC, said she thought the discussion went well, and she appreciated Sebelius coming to talk to people who actually dealt with the problems in the health care system everyday.

"We were all very happy the governor would sit down with us and listen to the people on the front line."

Veterinary Medicine associate dean of research and graduate programs, also was interviewed for Kaplan Publishing's 2008 edition of "You Are Here: A Guide to Over 380 Colleges and Unlimited Paths to Your Future."

At the time, Freeman was the only female associate dean of research for the College of Veterinary Medicine, and a colleague recommended her to Kaplan Publishing.

Freeman said she answered questions concerning the courses she took for her major, how she liked her job and was asked to give advice to students about her career.

K-State is "cutting edge" because it is student-centered with accessible faculty members, Freeman said. The university also offers its students hands-on research opportunities and other ways for involvement, she said.

"Kansas State has degree programs that are unique such as milling science, food safety and security," Freeman said. "The programs are cool and current."

Freeman said she thinks K-State will continue to stay ahead of other colleges and universities because of the faculty and staff's responsiveness to the students.

While K-State provides students with the most popular career choices, it also maintains a friendly atmosphere. According to the 2008 edition of Princeton Review's "Best 366 Colleges," one of K-State's biggest assets is "the highly friendly nature of the student body."

"The academic programs, location and atmosphere are what attract new freshmen to Kansas State," Bosco said.

Ben Woner, freshman in open option, said a good atmosphere and educational opportunities brought him to K-State.

Though Woner has not yet declared an academic major, he said he is confident that during his time at K-State he will find his career path.

"I feel honored to be accepted to K-State," Woner said.

"It is so high on the list of good schools."

last weekend," Lastra said. "I'm going to focus on that for our next matches."

The Wildcats did not take long to extend their streak of 259 consecutive matches with a service ace. K-State's first point was an ace by Lauren Mathewson, the first of 12 recorded by the Wildcats on Tuesday night. Jenny Jantsch, Stacey Spiegelberg and Angie Lastra led the team with three aces each.

Before the match, the K-State faithful waited in line to join the Purple Pit, a fan club that supports K-State at home matches.

Fritz said she loves the excitement the club generates by singing and cheering.

"It's a wonderful student section, and we are so lucky to have them," Fritz said. "The Purple Pit just makes it home."

The Wildcats' next action will be this weekend in Hawaii where the team will face Hawaii, Louisville and UCLA.

to begin sometime in the year 2010, and the facility should be operational by 2013.

Manhattan is one of only six potential sites that include Athens, Ga.; Flora, Miss.; Butner, N.C.; San Antonio, Texas; and Plum Island, N.Y. - the original site for the NBAF.

President Bush generated Demand for a new facility when he made a national security directive mandating the construction of an improved animal-disease research facility to protect against potential threats, said Larry Orluskie, senior public affairs specialist for the DHS.

The Plum Island facility was only able to perform bio-safety level-three research, whereas the new facility will have the capability to conduct research on level-four diseases.

Biosecurity levels are determined by the danger the diseases contained would pose to the public if they were released.

"The difference between biosecurity level three and four is that there is some mitigation with level three," said James Stack, director of the Biosecurity Research Institute at K-State. "With biosecurity level four, options aren't available."

Engineering team expands research

By Brigitte Brecheisen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A K-State civil engineering team's research on rural bridges remains unaffected by the bridge collapse in Minneapolis, Minn.

An ongoing, two-year research project titled "Intelligent Structural Health Monitoring of Rural Bridges," proposes a plan to develop a system to monitor and sustain a bridge's capacity.

The system uses a wireless sensory network system and experiments with a cost-effective, structural Fiber Reinforced Polymer to reinforce bridge strength.

The team working on the research is composed of Hayder Rasheed, Robert Peterman, Asadollah Esmaeily, Hani Melhelm and Brandon Decker.

This particular project is one of the few, if not the only, current research project that uses the special system that includes evaluating and applying solutions to enhance bridge safety, said Esmaeily, assistant professor of structural engineering.

Esmaeily said team members thought it was necessary to find a way to develop a system using existing resources that was effective in identifying and solving internal discrepancies in bridges.

With a budget of about $70,000 allocated by the University Transportation Department, the researchers were able to develop an experiment to simulate a bridge with FRP steel that would test its durability.

Esmaeily said many factors can affect the internal dynamic properties of a bridge, making it important to internally examine bridges annually for problems that might have developed from everyday use.

"Bridges are a crucial component to the transportation system," Esmaeily said. "If something were wrong with a bridge, people would not notice until something bad happened."

According to a report prepared by Decker, graduate student in structural engineering, and Rasheed, associate professor of civil engineering, the team constructed three identical T-beams to test the FRP repair and strengthening technique. They settled on wireless technology provided by MicroStrain, that would be used to gauge strain on the framework.

Similar research already has been conducted on buildings and other structures, Esmaeily said, but bridges are more complex, making the research more intensive and time consuming.

The team has contributed more than 200 hours to the project. This has not deterred the team in their efforts to increase the efficiency of bridges, as they have done all their research without receiving direct payment for the time they invested, said Peterman, associate professor of civil engineering.

Decker worked on the analytical and experimental aspects of this research project by constructing the model to test the strength of the FRP steel.

"For all of the time and effort he (Decker) has invested on this project, his work ethic

County bridges are safe, commissioners say

By Willow Williamson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When the bridge in Minneapolis, Minn., collapsed on Aug. 1, the United States re-examined how and when a bridge is considered safe.

In Riley County, officials always have watched bridges closely, so what happened in Minnesota is not likely to occur in Manhattan.

There are approximately 25,000 bridges in Kansas. The Kansas Department of Transportation maintains those that are on state roads, which accounts for about 5,000 bridges. The rest are maintained by cities and counties, said Steve Swartz, Public Information Officer for the Kansas Department of Transportation.

The federal government requires states to inspect all bridges every two years, Swartz said. KDOT abides by these rules and often exceeds them by performing even more inspections.

"We follow that schedule and sometimes do it better," Swartz said. "If we have concern about the bridge, we inspect it more."

Riley County also follows these standards for its bridges. Leon Hobson, Director of Public Works, said there are about 130 bridges in Riley County that must be inspected every two years. Seventy of those, he said, are inspected every year.

The Minneapolis bridge collapse did not change how Riley County inspects its bridges, said Bob Newsome, Riley County Commissioner.

"It did not really affect Kansas or Riley county, because we are already doing this, and we're up to date on it," Newsome said. "(The) State of Kansas has always been very good in inspecting the bridges and roads."

Bridge inspections, usually done visually, focus on each individual part of the bridge, said Dave Beech, professional engineer with Schwab-Eaton, the company that performs all inspections of Riley County bridges. They check the overall physical condition of the bridge, roadway, deck, superstructure and substructure for deterioration and deficiencies.

"We look at the channel condition and waterway to see how that affects the structure," Beech said. "We look at the waterway to see if that's damaging the structure at all."

When inspections reveal any problems with a bridge, steps are taken to ensure bridge users' safety, decreasing the weight limit on the bridge, increasing the number of inspections to once every year, or even closing the Senate hopes to switch from WebMail to Gmail soon

By Erin Fisher
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State Student Senate and Information Technology Services is looking into the issue of switching from WebMail to Gmail in the near future.

Student Senate first focused on the e-mail situation last year, said Matt Wagner, student body president and fifth-year student in management information systems. The idea of looking into the issue came from Elizabeth Unger, fellow vice provost of information technology services.

"Dr. Unger proposed it to us last year," Wagner said. "Student Senate was concerned."

Since last year, Senate has worked to switch e-mail providers.

"It's really a solution of support from Student Senate," Wagner said.

There have been several problems with WebMail, including spam and shrinking server space, said Wagner. WebMail's server space is located in the basement of Hale Library.

Student Senate has been working on switching e-mail providers since last year. They are hoping to make the transition to Google's Gmail.

"Right now, the server space is at a max," Wagner said. "The servers are so hot they have to bring in cooling units."

Wagner said the servers also are losing a significant amount of hard drive. Senators realize the need to switch, but the stages are only in the analyzation process, he said.

Information Technology Services for K-State has not made a decision yet in terms of switching e-mail providers. Discussions toward executing a plan should

K-State defers payments for students in disaster areas

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State students affected by the rash of severe weather and flooding in Kansas had a lot to worry about this summer, but for some, paying the tuition bill on time was not one of those worries.

According to the Kansas Board of Regents, the state's six universities can allow students to defer tuition and fee payments due in August until a later date.

This included many students at K-State.

Larry Moeder, student financial assistance director, said he received calls and e-mails from numerous students and families hurt financially by the disasters.

"A number of families lost everything, including jobs, and that certainly affected their ability to make payments," Moeder said.

Students from 43 storm-ravaged Kansas counties were declared eligible for federal assistance. Students from Greensburg, which was destroyed by a tornado in May, and severely flooded Coffeyville were able to defer payments.

Moeder said he e-mailed all known students in those areas and let them know they could get help from the university.

"Students that have been affected by the recent

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A growing trend in education across the country does not have much to do with a classroom.

A recent addition to the Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 is offered only online.

IQ Academy in Manhattan is a completely accredited online high school.

The district has teamed up with Keystone Credit Distance Learning of Portland, Ore., to develop an online high school for students across the state of Kansas, said Pamela Kislap, director of marketing for KC Distance Learning.

"The first online high school was opened by KC Distance Learning in Wisconsin four years ago," Kislap said.

IQ Academy is one of three statewide accredited high schools offered through KC Distance Learning, said Kislap.

"[The school district] realized a high need for online classes," said Lisa McClure, director of IQ Academy in Manhattan. "After developing IQ Academy, we were able to offer the classes state wide."

USD 383 started out offering online courses in correspondence with classes offered in the traditional school setting, McClure said, but now students across the state can enroll in solely online classes.

"We currently offer an extensive catalog of courses, as well as a large number of (Advanced Placement) classes," she said.

The credits acquired after finishing these courses will come from an accredited high school, so they are transferable to any high school in the state if students decide online classes are not for them, Kislap said.

Following a traditional school calendar, the classes take four years to complete, which is similar to any other high school, McClure said.

"Students might not spend 7 a.m. to 2:30 p.m. in class. It might be less time or more time, or they might do it in the middle of the night," McClure said.

"The online program is much more independently operated."

IQ Academy states their enrollment as 254 students, but it hopes to expand because of increasing demand.

The lack of social interaction due to the classes being offered entirely online is combated by the extensive program, McClure said.

"There is an online community where students can talk to each other and socialize," she said.

Because the program is so different, students should consider all their options carefully before switching to online classes, McClure said.

"Online schools are not for everyone, but it is an option that meets specific needs," McClure said.

70-year-old piers a part of Manhattan history

By Andy Heintz
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Just east of town on Kansas Highway 177 is a bridge, and to the left of it are two antique piers that are remnants of Manhattan's past. Some have said they should be removed, but one group wants them to be left alone as part of Manhattan's history.

In 1937, a bridge over the Kansas River known as the Pillsbury Viaduct was opened to the public.

A viaduct is a bridge consisting of a series of arches supported by piers used to carry a road—or railroad—over a valley.

The bridge was named to honor an early settler named Josiah Pillsbury, according to information from the Manhattan/Riley County Preservation Alliance.

Pillsbury campaigned against slavery in upstate New York along with anti-slavery advocate and founder of the New York Tribune Horace Greeley, according to Hale Library's university archives.

Most of the Pillsbury Viaduct was removed by the Kansas Department of Transportation in 1996. All that remains are the two piers.

The alliance listed these bridge piers as one of Manhattan's most endangered historical places because of their history and because they are an example of Art Deco architecture. The alliance members hope the City of Manhattan will choose to preserve the piers for their historical value.

"It is OK to leave them as they are," said Debbie Saroff, vice president of the alliance.

Dixie West, member of the alliance's board of directors, explained how European countries protect historical ruins.

"When you go to Europe and countries overseas, cities or towns often have ruins on their outskirts," West said.

"They would never think of tearing these ruins down, because they are a part of the history of the community."

Ron Fehr, Manhattan City Manager, said there have been several suggestions about what to do about the piers, like incorporating the western pier into an overlook so it connects to the levee or to put a natural art sculpture on the piers.

There are no upcoming meetings scheduled to determine the fate of the piers.

TO THE POINT

E-mail needs facelift

If there is one constant technological frustration among K-State students and faculty members, it is Web-Mail.

Spam mail is frequent, and it often is not filtered into WebMail's junk folder. Hard-drive and server space are limited. With the servers overheating, more server space is lost each day.

In fall 2004, several changes were made to WebMail, which included spam filtering and usability improvements, according to K-State's Information Technology Web site.

It is time K-State e-mail received another facelift. An outsourcing is needed to increase server and hard-drive space.

Additional features like photo sharing and a campus-wide calendar also would allow students and faculty more options with their e-mail accounts.

Student Senate members should continue to work with Information Technology Services and other university officials to implement a new and improved e-mail system at K-State.

In the meantime, students and faculty members should also do their part in keeping Web-Mail less congested. Delete old e-mails that are no longer needed. Create folders to keep necessary e-mails stored. Check the junk folder frequently, and delete the messages that truly are "junk."

It is still unknown if K-State's WebMail will receive Gmail outsourcing, but until then, students and faculty should manage their WebMail inboxes responsibly to help the already-shrinking server space.

Boating, alcohol consumption can lead to tragic weekend

The death of a loved one is an unexplainable feeling.

Hearing about it is one thing, but when you witness it, you tend to take life much more seriously.

MEGAN MOLITOR

A group of friends and I decided to beat the Labor Day rush last year and went to the lake for a few sun-burn-filled days. Toward the end of the first day, ready for a change of course from beer to real food, we decided to head in. Before docking, we filled the boat with gas and heard a horrible story.

Only a few yards away, a Jet Ski had passed in front of a speed boat.

Without being able to stop, the much larger boat ran over the Jet Ski, killing the driver.

The group of people in the boat knew the Jet Ski driver and made the unwise decision to race each other. The Jet Ski driver was zig-zagging alongside the boat and made the error in judgment to cross in front of the boat.

Workers at the scene of the accident assumed alcohol most likely was involved.

Drinking is commonly involved in lake experiences, and many would consider a trip incomplete if only soda and water were offered.

Many view drinking on a boat as a way to relax after a week of work or school—nothing to do but lay out and enjoy.

Hearing the outcome of this tragic accident is enough to make a person at least stop and think before they pop the next tab while out on the water.

According to Kansas Boating License and Boat Safety, the effect of alcohol is increased by the natural stressors placed on your body while boating. Alcohol, combined with these stressors, impairs an operator's ability to drive safely.

Research has proven one-third of the amount of alcohol it takes to make a person legally intoxicated on land can make a boater equally intoxicated on the water, according to the organization.

The bottom line is, being drunk while driving a boat or some other type of water vehicle makes it more likely to be the last ride a person enjoys.

All these statistics wouldn't have much effect on me until I saw the mangled Jet Ski someone once enjoyed.

It's difficult to contemplate how the victim's friends and family felt while witnessing the death of their loved one. It's a gruesome image.

A story like this won't stop lake-goers from bringing a car-load of beer with them.

It also does not mean enjoying a few drinks while feeling the wind in your hair and the spray of water on your face is wrong either. But if you're planning to be behind the wheel—or handles—of any watercraft this Labor Day weekend, keep this story in mind, and remember the family who would not want to see it happen to you.

Dear soldier

Citizens should write letters, show troops they care

When listening to political debates, presidential addresses or country music concerts, the phrase "support our troops" is almost certain to be spoken.

There is no greater responsibility than the one placed upon the U.S. military. We have brand-ed our armed forces as the greatest fighting force the world has ever known. Sorry, Romans, but we have better technology.

The phrase "support our troops" is a universal rallying call, which places people on the right end of the political spectrum.

It allows people to say they disagree with being in Iraq, but despite their objection still "support our troops." The problem is, our words are not matching our actions.

Newsday of New York reported on Aug. 17, "in a half-million-person army, last year's suicide toll translates to a rate of 17.3 per 100,000, the highest since the army started counting in 1980."

The suicide rate amongst our country's most elite is at a 30-year peak. Even in the last two years, the number of confirmed suicides increased from 87 in 2005 to 99 in 2006.

Before any rash judgments are made about their reasons, it is important to set up the situation in which many of these suicides are occurring.

In the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan, our soldiers are facing the worst conditions since the beginning of the war.

They face extended tours of duty from 12 to 15 months, repeated tours of duty because of low recruitment numbers, an enemy whose sole purpose is not to win but die for their cause, and constant 120-degree heat.

These are not normal fighting conditions and probably not what they signed up for.

According to the Washington Post on Aug. 17, the main reason many of these soldiers are committing suicide stems from failed marriages and relationships.

The Post goes on to report extended tours in violent warfare, additional tours and general lack of soldier counseling as the main catalysts behind the failed relationships.

Put simply, soldiers are simply unaware of the extent to which the war is affecting them.

We can all agree the strain soldiers experience is the ultimate test of how much the human body and mind can take. Soldiers put their lives on the line, and many have regrettably lost their lives in combat.

Their tremendous sacrifice will never be forgotten because of the bravery they displayed. But losing soldiers who could have been helped is an entirely different story.

The Independent, a London-based newspaper, reported on Aug. 17 that the army's resources are being spread too thin.

As the largest branch of the military, the army is complaining because of the extended deployments for combat troops.

The army also has been scrutinized for not providing enough help to soldiers, both in combat and when they return home.

The Washington Post also made another observation about the suicides—62 percent of the 99 people that committed suicide last year had served, or were serving, in areas of heavy violence.

The army is trying to combat this stress by increasing the number of military psychiatrists by 25 percent this year and training troops to recognize signs of extreme mental stress in themselves.

With this information, they can seek help if certain symptoms manifest themselves.

Once again, the military isn't getting what it needs to treat the strains caused by the current warfare. It doesn't have enough resources to deal with this extremely difficult hand.

Whether a person disagrees or agrees with the current war should not be the first issue in resolving this problem. The first response should be, "How do we help those with no choice but to stay and fight? How do we take care of the bravest and finest this country has to offer?"

The Post said this year alone the army has confirmed 44 suicides, with 27 committed in combat zones.

There are small ways we can help. Many of us have friends or family members stationed overseas or in training.

Write them a letter, send an e-mail and somehow offer support and remind them they have people who care about them.

If you don't know someone serving, get online and find a way to start sending letters directly to troops.

It might be time to find a new way to "support our troops," and we better do it now.

PUBLIC AFFAIRS

Collegian to boost relations

The Collegian's goal is to improve communication through public response.

As Public Affairs Correspondents, we will be mediators between the public and the Collegian. We are looking for both reader feedback and story ideas about events going on in individual departments on campus.

The Collegian seeks to expand its relationship with you as readers and to consider your opinions and ideas for improvements.

In order to do so, we have created an e-mail address designed specifically for reader feedback. It is collegianpublicaffairs@gmail.com.

It is our job to be the eyes and the ears of the public, and we will make sure your thoughts are heard here at the Collegian.

Departmental feedback is also important to us. We want to have strong relationships with each department to give the entire campus an opportunity to inform us of newsworthy events that we might otherwise have overlooked.

In order to maintain this sort of communication on a personal level, each department will have a designated correspondent to use as their "go-to" person for the school year.

This way, we can both receive departmental feedback and be aware of activity within each department.

Each department will receive a more detailed e-mail from one of us that will include our names and contact information within the next week.

Grain sciences professor produces high-fiber snacks

By Emily Sterk
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A professor in the Department of Grain Sciences and Industry is in the process of making high-fiber snacks that offer a variety of health benefits.

Sajid Alavi, assistant professor of grain sciences and industry, is leading the project and said the snacks aim to lower cholesterol and blood pressure and reduce the risks of diabetes, heart disease and colon cancer.

"It goes back to 30 percent of Americans are clinically obese," he said. "Lots of fiber helps in reducing calories."

Alavi said he thinks the snack will attract health-conscious people, specifically consumers between the ages of 30 and 50 years old because they gain weight easily.

He said if adults eat the snacks, children might take notice and hopefully will eat the snacks as well.

He said the project relates to America because obesity is an issue.

"General obesity is such a problem—people talk about it," he said. "(A high-fiber snack) has so much potential to meet the demand, and people want to eat it."

Alavi said the project is challenging because it is hard to produce the color needed for the snack, which makes the dough difficult to produce.

"It leads to poor-quality dough, and it does not give products like cereal that certain crunch," Alavi said.

Eric Maichel, extrusion operations manager for grain sciences and industry, helped Alavi with the project.

Maichel said he chose to be involved with making the snacks because he is interested in health appeal and how a product is made.

Marsha Boswell, public relations specialist for Kansas Wheat, said projects like Alavi's help find new ways to use wheat.

"One of the things that Kansas Wheat is looking for is new uses, and we gave (K-State) a chance to bring out value to wheat," she said.

Blu-Ray, HD DVD go head to head to control high-definition market

By Brigitte Brecheisen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Rivalry is fierce between HD DVD and Blu-Ray technology to produce the best high-definition player on the market.

The two are competing to become the successors to the DVD player.

Ryan Rush, media specialist at Best Buy in Manhattan, said it would be a while before either system comes out on top.

The separate systems both offer a wide range of components that are not offered on current DVD players, according to a June 2006 report in Electronic House magazine.

With the advent of high-definition television, a DVD's storage capacity was not sufficient to the new application, according to the report. High-definition players needed to be updated to accommodate for the HDTV's high resolution.

Blu-Ray was the first high-definition player introduced to the public in February 2002, according to Sony.com. It offers the highest disk capacity of any other players on the market.

Blu-Ray also has a majority of Hollywood studios pledging to release movies using this format, Rush said.

"Sony owns about all of the companies, so I would pick Blu-Ray technology over anything else," said William Robinson, Wal-Mart associate in electronics.

Paramount, however, upset the trend by exclusively settling on HD DVD over Blu-ray on Aug. 21. The manufacturing cost to switch to HD DVD is considerably less expensive than that of Blu-Ray because Toshiba can use current DVD manufacturing facilities to develop its player, Rush said.

HD DVD players are not only cheaper to make, but they also offer more in the way of special features, said Rush.

Despite the new format's introduction to the market, the DVD will not become obsolete like its predecessor, the videotape.

DVDs are fully compatible with both players that have been developed, according to Toshiba.com.

Students at K-State have shown a split interest between the two high-definition formats.

"I would choose Blu-Ray because there are more options," said Jennifer Princ, graduate student in math.

Alissa Vogel, junior in political science and geography, considered price first.

"I would purchase an HD DVD player, because the benefits associated with the Blu-Ray format does not outweigh the costs," Vogel said.

Blu-Ray has outsold its rival HD DVD format 2-to-1 during the first half of 2007, according to a Home Media Research report on Aug. 14.

The high road

Coach Ron Prince wasted no time implementing his aggressive scheduling philosophy, adding high-profile opponents like Louisville, Miami and UCLA. The Wildcats will look to win their 18th-consecutive season opener when they visit Auburn on Saturday.

SEC values focused on money

The Southeastern Conference is the premier football conference in America, and K-State players and fans will witness its glory on Saturday.

The SEC has owned the college football attendance crown for 26 years. Football is a way of life for SEC fans. Yes, that sounds cliché, but they wear their Sunday best to football games.

Auburn, for example, has some of the nation's best traditions, like an eagle flying in before every game and the Tiger Walk (like the Wildcat Walk, but multiplied by 100).

Why am I not impressed? Yes, the eagle thing will be cool and the stadium loud, but beneath the tradition of SEC football lies a tremendous pressure to win at any cost. The SEC has had at least one team on probation since 1985.

Auburn has been on probation five times in its history. The tradition, to me, is to forget morals, just win and wear your best clothes doing it.

To an outsider, the pressure that goes along with winning and tradition in SEC is out of control. I am not saying there is no pressure in the Big 12 Conference, but it doesn't compare to the pressure schools like Florida, Auburn and Alabama face.

Alabama is a prime example of how that pressure can tempt a school to bend the rules. The last time the Crimson Tide won a national championship was 1992 under Gene Stallings. Since Stallings left in 1996, the Crimson Tide has gone through four head coaches and spent time on NCAA probation. Alabama also finished 6-7 last year.

Alabama still is classified as a big-time football program because of the money it spends to keep the program successful. They pay Nick Saban $4 million a year to be its head football coach – the biggest deal in college football history.

The lowest-paid SEC coach is Mississippi's Ed Orgeron, who makes $905,000.

Ron Prince earns a base salary of $750,000 a year, though K-State has seen more success in the last 10 years than Alabama or Ole Miss.

Money, cheating and tradition is what the SEC seems to be all about.

But they win. The SEC has the reigning national champion Florida and six of its 12 teams opening the season in the Associated Press Top-25 poll.

Is the cost of winning really worth it? I don't think so.

But football isn't a game anymore. At least in the SEC, it has turned into a business.

Ryne Witt is a senior in print journalism. Please send comments to sports@spub.ksu.edu.

RYNE WITT

Prince selects big-name opponents to bring spotlight

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

They won't admit it, of course.

But chances are, even die-hard K-State fans have caught themselves thinking, if only for a moment, that Ron Prince must be crazy.

Prince has heard this before, most recently in an interview with an Alabama radio station.

"The host of the radio show said, 'Whoever put this schedule together needs to have their head examined,'" Prince recalled. "I said, 'I guess I'd be in the front of that line.'"

Why the speculation about Prince's mental faculties? It's because K-State's second-year coach makes no secret of his desire to put the Wildcats up against some of the premier programs in the nation.

"To prepare for a national championship-caliber team was one of our goals in our nonconference schedule – to play a team where there's absolutely no doubt about their reputation and abilities," Prince said.

Prince wasted little time putting that vision into practice after he arrived at K-State. He added several big-name opponents to the schedule, including Louisville, Miami, UCLA and Auburn, the team K-State will face in Saturday's season opener.

The Tigers enter the game ranked 18th in the Associated Press Top 25 and return 12 starters from a team that finished 11-2 a season ago.

The game will be at Auburn's Jordan-Hare Stadium, where the Tigers are 255-62-7 all-time. A sell-out crowd of 85,451 is expected, which would be the largest crowd ever to witness a K-State football game. In addition, ESPN will beam the game to more than 93 million households as its prime-time Saturday night telecast.

Does it sound nuts? Not to Prince.

"They obviously have a very high opinion – as they should – of their team," he said. "But I like our team. I'm not conceding anything when we go play this game. Our coaches and our players are very excited about it. This is the reason why we come coach at Kansas State, play at Kansas State."

To Prince, this is more than just a football game. It's also a marketing tool, a way to put K-State in the national spotlight.

"Because it's a national television game, we get the chance to go and have the Powercat and our branding opportunity national and be able to tell the story about Kansas State," Prince said. "That's always a very good opportunity."

Prince's philosophy would seem to put him at odds with his predecessor, Bill Snyder, who often was perceived as a soft scheduler.

In his 17 years at K-State, Snyder lost just one season opener – his first, a 31-0 loss at Arizona State in 1989 – while playing mostly small-conference opponents.

"Each coach has their own way of scheduling," said Jonathan Beasley, a starting quarterback under Snyder in 2000 and 2001. "Coach Snyder's deal was to give younger players a chance to get some playing time before the Big 12 season."

Snyder was not opposed to opening the season with a major-conference opponent, however. K-State played California, Southern California and Iowa in season openers between 2000 and 2003.

Beasley started the game against Iowa, a 27-7 K-State victory in 2000.

"It was hotter than the dickens," he recalled. "It was probably about 120 on the field. But it was a great opportunity for us to get out and play a recognized team, and we were fortunate enough to win."

Still, K-State never opened the season against an opponent of Auburn's magnitude during the Snyder era. In fact, it's been 34 years since K-State faced a ranked foe in its season opener. That was in 1973, when the Wildcats fell to No. 14 Florida 21-10.

But as recruiting becomes increasingly competitive, Beasley said playing high-profile, prime-time games takes on added importance.

"Any time you get your school out there on national TV, you're going to reach kids you wouldn't reach otherwise," he said. "They're going to remember that game from prime time. They see that Powercat, and they remember it."

That's the idea, at least. And no one understands that better than Prince, who said he anticipates a growing number of big-name nonconference match-ups in coming seasons.

"When you listen to the television people, they have had a very small inventory of these types of games in years past," Prince said. "I think you're seeing more and more of these games. Oklahoma and Oregon a year ago is a demonstration of how much attention these kinds of games can get. We're excited to be a part of it."

Fritz stumbles into decathlon, nearly medals

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Steve Fritz doesn't believe in focusing on the future. He prefers to take on whatever goal is right in front of him.

While he was in high school, if someone asked him where he was going to be in 20 years, he probably wouldn't have answered "Olympic decathlon athlete" or "K-State track coach." Still, that's where he is, sitting in his corner office in Ahearn Field House.

When Fritz was growing up in tiny Gypsum, Kan., and attending Southeast of Saline High School, track and field was only his third-favorite sport. Back then, Fritz planned on being a basketball star.

His problem was few players from small, rural schools like Southeast even had the opportunity to play for the big universities. Instead of playing for a small school, Fritz decided to take the junior college route.

"I didn't want to go to NAIA (National Association of Intercollegiate Athletics) or KCAC (Kansas Collegiate Athletic Conference) or anything like that," said Fritz, who is married to K-State volleyball coach Suzie Fritz. "My only chance to get to Division I was to go to JuCo. Hutchinson (Community College) had a really good program, so that's the school that I chose to go to."

While on scholarship to play basketball at Hutchinson, he decided to walk-on to the track team and try the decathlon, an event he had never attempted. The decathlon consists of 10 events, combining running, throwing and leaping abilities, spread over two days.

It did not take Fritz long to find success in his new sport. He won the junior-college national meet his freshman year.

"The thing that got me going early was, I wasn't great in anything, but I wasn't terrible at anything," Fritz said. "So I had a bunch of average events, which made life easier than it is for some."

The next stop for Fritz was K-State in 1988. This time, he got a full ride from the track team and walked on to Lon Kruger's basketball squad.

He continued to find success in the decathlon, placing in the top 10 in the NCAA meet in 1988 and 1989.

From there he kept training for various international events.

Fritz said one misconception about track and field was that it only mattered every four years for the Olympics.

"You're kind of looking ahead, but you're never looking further than one event ahead," he said. "There's always some meet coming up. You have in the back of your mind where you want to be at the end of those four years, but there's three other big meets along the way that you have to take care of. Your career window is so short."

In 1991, Fritz won the World University Championship in Sheffield, England.

He competed alongside the world's toughest competition until 1998 when he broke his foot. Before injuries cut his career short, Fritz had reached the peak of his career at the 1996 Olympics in Atlanta, placing fourth and missing a medal by 20 points.

"Medaling is all relative," Fritz said. "I've got medals, and they sit in drawers, and they don't really mean that much, honestly."

"If you get too caught up in the medals, I think you lose out on the experience. At least for me, I've won medals and set records or whatever, but when I think back on my career and what happened I don't think about that. I think about the people I've met and the places I've been."

Though he is nearly a decade removed from his days of competing at the Olympic level, Hurling a discus, Steve Fritz, practices for one of the 10 decathlon events at R.V. Christian Track.

el, his old high school still remembers all he accomplished. Fritz still holds a few of the hurdles records at Southeast and the school renamed the football field after him.

Fritz said he owes his successful decathlon career to his small-school roots. Like K-State football players Jordy Nelson and Ian Campbell, Fritz had to work hard to get the big universities to recognize his talent.

"I'm a big fan of the small schools, because they give you the opportunity to do a lot of different things," he said. "If I would have grown up in Manhattan and gone to Manhattan High, I wouldn't be sitting here today, because I wouldn't have been doing track."

ASK THE 5TH YEAR

Nudity solves problems

I see this really cute girl working at Starbucks all the time. How do I get her to notice me?

I think I know who you're talking about, and I wouldn't mind asking her out myself.

ADAM REICHENBERGER

There are several things you could do. This is what I recommend.

First, walk in naked. That'll get her attention.

If that doesn't work, develop a healthy addiction to caffeine right away. Get the addiction to the point where you must visit Starbucks every day.

Seeing each other everyday quickly will turn your small talk into extended conversations; then ask her out to lunch. If not lunch then something small—maybe bring some friends. If it goes well, take her out on an actual date.

Just make sure you don't get caught playing beer pong with her until odd hours of the morning, blacking out and waking up alone and naked with your clothes strewn about the kitchen. Trust me, it doesn't end well.

Now, should your caffeine addiction take a turn for the worse, they'll probably have you admitted to rehab.

But every addict needs a sponsor, which takes us back to Starbucks girl. It's a win-win situation. Caffeine addiction. That's the key to her heart.

My roommate has the worst-smelling feet. How can I get him to take care of it?

Embarrass him about it every chance you get in front of every person he knows. Eventually he'll develop a complex and seek help ... right?

If you don't care about his feelings then just yell at him, and if you do care, then it can be tricky.

I lived with an Eastern European for a year. If you think your roommate smells bad, travel to Eastern Europe. Until you have, don't complain.

My roommate was a nice guy, though, but my other roommates and I just couldn't handle the stench.

To help out, our parents sent care packages containing assorted items: soap, popcorn, soap, movie tickets, soap, shampoo, candy, soap, deodorant, soap, cologne and soap.

We also made a point of making sure he saw us put on our deodorant every day.

However, none of this worked, because my other roommates didn't bathe either, so he never really got the point. If you're as unfortunate as this, then keep your windows open and buy out On The Wild Side's entire supply of incense. I recommend Nag Champa.

My roommate's girlfriend is around all the time. Is there any way to get rid of her?

Walk around naked ... all the time. It works on more than just cute Starbucks employees.

Do you know when they're stopping by? If yes, try doing some toe touches in your skins.

They want to watch a movie? Watch it with them, right beside the love birds. Rub your nakedness all over them.

Keeping you up at night? Strip down and practice your long snaps.

Now to you females out there, I would give the same advice, however, it will work in the opposite manner. Needless to say, your roommate will quit bringing her boyfriend by if he's constantly ogling your "goodies."

It's amazing how many problems can be solved by some friendly nudity. Just watch out for those Northerlies. They can be deathly cold.

COLLEGE CUISINE

Wake up, K-State

Photos by Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

Homemade biscuits and gravy can be made in less than 20 minutes for less than $8.

Homemade biscuit, gravy recipe is easy, cost-effective

By Adam Ingersoll
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

While biscuits and homemade gravy seems like a difficult dish to make, it can be made with less than $8 and in 20 minutes.

First, preheat the oven to 375 degrees.

Begin by browning the sausage over medium heat in a large skillet, stirring and breaking up clusters frequently. When purchasing sausage, you get what you pay for, and store brands are just not good enough. Spend the extra fifty cents and buy a reputable brand.

When the oven is preheated, place one package of evenly spaced biscuits on a cookie sheet or baking stone.

Once the sausage is completely browned with no pink meat left, remove it from the heat and drain all but a couple tablespoons of grease, which you will use in the gravy.

Be sure not to drain grease into the sink—to prevent clogs—or the trash can—to prevent fires. Pour it into a disposable container, and when it solidifies, throw it away.

Now, start on the gravy.

Slowly sprinkle flour onto the sausage while stirring until each piece is lightly coated and no more grease is visible. If the flour is added too quickly or too much is added it will clump together and produce lumpy gravy.

Add milk to the flour-coated sausage until it is about three-quarters covered, and simmer on low to medium heat for about 10 minutes, stirring frequently.

Check the biscuits regularly. They are done when they appear golden brown. The gravy will thicken gradually as it simmers and quickly as it cools. Add a touch of milk to thin the gravy to your preference.

After about 10 minutes of simmering, the biscuits and gravy will be done. Add salt and pepper to the gravy to taste.

Leftover gravy warms up well

WHAT YOU NEED

Cost: $7.76 at Dillon's
Time: 20 min.
Makes: 8

Ingredients:

1 pkg. Jumbo Buttermilk Biscuits
¼ gal. milk
1 lb. ground sausage
½ c. flour
salt and pepper

in the microwave if you add a tablespoon of milk, and it can be eaten on toast rather than biscuits, if you prefer.

Band still has not lost drive to produce quality music

Dave Matthews Band

Concert review by Eric Davis

Those who believe the Dave Matthews Band is running out of steam have a little less wind in their sails after the band's most recent show in Bonner Springs, Kan.

The band played an eclectic mix of songs from its catalog, and each song sounded like the band had been playing together for 50 years.

The band's ability to listen to each other on stage is something from another world. And Carter Beauford, who played the entire show with a smile on his face, kept control of the sound using his double-bass signals.

Demonstrating the evolution of even their oldest songs, the band opened with the classic one-two punch of "So Much to Say" and "Too Much." The band combined the two songs when it segued from one to the other.

The band also played new songs that some fans did not know as well. "The Idea of You" pleased fans who fell in love with the song when it debuted on the band's last summer tour.

The most extraordinary display of the evening was the band's 20-minute version of "Seek Up." Complete with solos from Butch Taylor, Boyd Tinsley and LeRoi Moore, the song held the audience's attention the entire time.

The visual show was as exciting as the music. Three long screens hung behind the band with different camera views displayed on each. The lights fit the music so well, it was like they became a part of the band. The bright white flashes that punctuated the extended version of "Louisiana Bayou" were especially spectacular.

Overall, the members

of the Dave Matthews Band have not lost any steam in the many years they have been together. Their excellence now only cements them in the minds of many as one of the greatest jam bands of all time.

BRIDGE | Collapse brings awareness is like that of a laborer," Peterman said.

The collapse of the Interstate 35 bridge on Aug. 2 in Minneapolis raised questions and concerns about the safety of bridges everywhere, particularly Kansas where there are six bridges that have a similar deck-truss design as did the I-35 bridge, according to an Aug. 26 Associated Press report.

"Unfortunately, compared to many states, Kansas isn't allocating near as much money towards bridge research," Esmaeily said.

The aftermath of the I-35 bridge collapse did not affect the team's research; however, interviews with local TV stations and newspapers did bring their work into the public eye.

Students also identified the importance of bridge research. Stephanie Fairbanks, senior in biology, grew up in rural Kansas and said she saw many bridges in poor condition.

"I think it's sad that it took the Minneapolis bridge collapse to get people aware that these things need to be looked at, which could prevent similar disasters, large and small, from happening," Fairbanks said.

Peterman stressed the importance of the public maintaining interest in bridge conditions.

BRIDGE 2 | Taxes fund inspections

bridge, depending on the severity of problems with the bridge, Newsome said.

Bridge condition is based on a zero to nine Federal Highway Administration scale, according to the KDOT Web site. When a bridge is given a rating of four or less, federal regulations state the bridge must receive an annual inspection. However, KDOT will inspect a bridge annually if rated less than five.

It is rare that a bridge inspection will require immediate maintenance, Hobson said. Only when situations like weather damage the bridge will it need immediate attention.

"Deterioration of a bridge is a slow process," he said. "It happens over a number of years. It's not an overnight effect."

However, Swartz said bridges in bad condition will not be ignored.

"If we have an unsafe bridge, we close it down," he said. "It is shut down immediately."

Each year Riley County has a budget for bridge and road maintenance, Newsome said.

"We have an annual budget that includes county property tax, state funds and also some federal funds, and that usually runs around $5 million a year," he said. "That covers all of our personnel that work on roads and so forth. It covers all the equipment we need, and it covers all the materials used to upkeep or rebuild roads."

The $5 million does not cover the cost of what they need, so the county commissioner raised sales tax by a half cent, which over a 10 year period will bring in $15 million to $16 million to help cover the costs, Newsome said.

There are several types of bridges. The bridge that collapsed in Minneapolis is called a deck truss bridge, Swartz said. There are only six deck truss bridges in Kansas, and they are located in the Kansas City area and in Atchison, Kan., and they all are inspected annually.

"The thing to keep in mind — most of our bridges are not constructed the same as the one up in Minneapolis," Hobson said.

He considers all roads and bridges near Manhattan safe and in good condition.

"We inspect them with regularity. We're up to date on our inspections, and if we find one that is unsafe or we have questions about it, we'll either repair it, replace it or close it."

GMAIL | Outsourcing to add storage

take place relatively soon, said James Lyle, associate vice provost for Information Technology Services.

"We believe we need to explore some options for what the next step is for providing e-mail service to our faculty, staff and students here," Lyle said. "No one has made the decision to, in fact, switch to anything just yet."

Photo and document sharing would be a part of Google applications which students will be able to use, Wagner said.

A university-wide calendar would also apply to each student's e-mail account.

"I think it would be a good idea to have students on the same page with the calendar," said Kim Chamberlin, junior in kinesiology.

Student Senate is aware that only so much can be done to filter unwanted messages, Wagner said.

"It's going to filter the spam a lot better," Wagner said. "We're going to protect your privacy as much as possible, but e-mail is e-mail."

Advertising is another worry for Senate when it comes to switching to Gmail, Wagner said.

"One thing we would like to do is negotiate no ads," he said.

Students with a Gmail account will not be affected at all, because their K-State account will remain different, Wagner said. The design of K-State Gmail also will not be visually different but it will be more of a storage space change.

"Students won't see any major change," Wagner said.

WebMail now allows students to have 20 megabytes of mail storage. With Gmail, storage space would raise to one gigabyte.

"It's good to have more storage space for e-mails," Chamberlin said.

Using Gmail would give students many advantages, Wagner said.

"I really think it would benefit the students to have this accessory," he said.

natural disasters have had more immediate and pressing concerns than tuition due dates," Regents Chair Christine Downey-Schmidt said in a press release. "It's important that we do everything that we can do to ease the back-to-school transition for these students."

Moeder said students will be expected to pay the deferred payments when they receive necessary financial assistance on or by Nov. 1.

He also said the K-State Office of Financial Assistance takes several steps to assist students with their college costs.

Moeder said the Office of Student Financial Assistance usually handles a few cases each year of students needing financial aid because of disaster or losses, but not to this extent. He said previous students' concerns were handled on a case-by-case basis.

"It simply gives all the families time to get everything together," he said.

Moeder and Kip Peterson, Regents director of government relations and communications, said they do not remember any other assistance plans of this size from the Regents.

"It was a very unique summer with the floods and tornadoes and so many students affected," Peterson said.

According to the press release, more than 21,000 students from the 43 affected counties attended the six Kansas universities in the fall 2006 semester.

SGA members debate allocations plan for travel expenses

By Whitney Hodgins
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student senators discussed travel allotments and the new ambassador program late into the night at their inaugural meeting Thursday.

The majority of the first Student Government Association meeting was spent analyzing an amendment that, if passed, would limit travel allocations for campus-wide, college council and fine arts organizations to a single request for $1,000. The amendment was written so more funding could be allotted to on-campus activities with the hope of attracting more students to on-campus activities, said Bryan Cox, allocations chair and senior in political science and economics.

College-wide organizations can request up to five allocations a year, two of which can be used for travel allotments of $1,000 each. College council already abides by the limitations specified in the amendment, and SGA wants to unify the policy.

"We want groups to use student activity fees on campus so students can benefit from the money they're paying," said Amy Schultz, senate vice chair and junior in biology and pre-medicine. "If groups cover more of their own travel expenses, the money could be used to improve activities close to K-State."

Opponents of the bill said travel opportunities should not be limited because they offer groups more meaningful learning experiences than on-campus events.

However, travel allotments steadily have increased over the past three years, while the actual number of travel requests have declined, according to a breakdown of travel fund allocations Cox presented.

"There's no such thing as a free lunch. Somewhere, somebody has to pay for it," he said, quoting Nobel-prize winning economist Milton Friedman. "It's a delicate balance. We have to come up with something to maintain that balance."

According to the information Cox provided, travel reserves available for distribution currently stand at $33,000. Campus-wide organizations used 53 percent of their budgets for traveling off campus last year, while campus councils used 72 percent of their budgets.

"The groups that request multiple travel allotments will be effected the most," Schultz said.

The bill was held for referral to the allocations committee, and will be reviewed during the next senate meeting.

17th street to closeBy Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sections of 17th Street will close next week because of parking-garage construction.

Because of relocating high-voltage electric lines along the street on campus, different sections will be closed from Tuesday through Friday, said Darwin Abbott, director of K-State's Parking Services.

The northbound lane that runs just east of the Information Booth will be closed on both Tuesday and Wednesday, while two-way traffic in the other two lanes will remain unaffected. The Information Booth will relocate temporarily to the east parking lot of the K-State Alumni Center.

The remaining two lanes will be closed on both Thursday and Friday, while all northbound, on-campus traffic from Anderson Avenue to College Heights Road will remain open on those days.

Abbott said all the parking shuttle systems from the Bramlage Coliseum parking lots to the K-State Student Union will continue to operate.

Also, pedestrians should be able to continue walking in the area, he said.

"There's going to be equipment there that's going to slow the flow down," Abbott said.

"We want students and faculty to know ahead of time so that they can build in a little extra time and not get hyperactive because we want everyone to be safe."

Scalping law changes make ticket purchasing easier

By Whitney Hodgins
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ticket scalping is a state-specific law ignored by our nation's youth.

As an economic opportunity, scalping has moved from fast-talking kids catering to hopeful line-waiters to electronic career ticket-brokers, and state laws are similarly complicated when it comes to the legality of the act. It's legal in Kansas, where Wildcat football tickets twinkle like diamonds posted on stubhub.com.

A proposed law change in Missouri might make it easier for students to obtain concert tickets. There are 14 states that still charge scalpers with a misdemeanor if caught selling tickets for more than the box-office price. Missouri, however, might get to cross its name off that list if an amendment to House Bill 327 is approved by state Senate.

Gov. Matt Blunt, R-Mo., currently is leading a special legislative session to rewrite the bill, which he vetoed earlier this month. If the anti-scalping law is repealed, Missouri residents will legally be able to re-sell tickets at any price.

Scalping is the selling of tickets to an event for an amount higher than their face value and is a popular option for people who want to obtain tickets before or after they become available to the public.

Ticket brokers, or scalpers, buy them directly from consumers or directly from distributors and resell them to make a profit. It's also not uncommon for consumers to sell their own tickets if they have too many or cannot attend the event.

Many states have repealed their anti-scalping laws

Starting date for biosecurity institute's research pushed back a year to early 2008

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It takes a long time to prepare a top-notch science facility for potentially hazardous research. For K-State's Biosecurity Research Institute, it takes more than 1 1/2 years.

The institute, which had its ribbon-cutting ceremony in October 2006, will begin scientific research in early 2008, said BRI director James Stack. It originally was scheduled to begin research in January 2007.

"We're testing again a lot of the systems and making sure that we can predict how they will perform under a wide range of conditions," Stack said.

Stack also said he is training the staff to ensure proper equipment use and cleaning procedures.

"It's a complex building," Stack said. "It has a lot of technology you are not going to find in an ordinary research facility."

Much of the staff, which includes several undergraduate students, is trained in a built-in training facility. Stack said the facility gives staff plenty of opportunities to work with the building equipment before it actually matters. He said a staff of 30-40 people is needed to ensure the building is ready for the scientists.

"I think it's important that the community understands that it's not just sitting out there and nobody's paying attention," said Jerry Jaax, associate vice provost for research compliance. "Before you can even acquire the agents, you have to go through exhausting conditioning."

When it starts research, the institute, which is housed in Pat Roberts Hall, will focus on several biological threats to the environment, as well as biological issues like food safety, animal health, plant health and a variety of biological processes.

"I'm not aware of any other facility in the United States that will address the depth that this facility will," said Ron Trewyn, vice provost of research.

Stack said the highly skilled staff will study several kinds of pathogens, insects and other organisms to gain knowledge and develop possible treatments.

Jaax said the BRI is special because it allows the scientists to work with actual organisms instead of reviewing research and making a determination through those observations.

"Most of the diseases we are talking about at the BRI, you can't use," Jaax said. "You can't do anything with them

Students meet department heads, learn about majors at barbecue

By Christine Caplinger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students had a chance to apply skills they have learned in Convention Services and Event Planning at the second-annual Human Ecology Grill and Chill on Thursday afternoon.

Brian Park, senior in golf course management, volunteered for the event.

"It was a good event to use my skills I'm learning in class," Park said. "It was great advertisement for the school, and it was a good chance for older students to meet the younger students."

Purple balloons, table coverings and raffle prizes covered the Justin Hall library and patio. Anyone who filled out a survey received a gift, a McAlister's Deli cookie coupon and a chance to win a 30-Giga Bite Apple iPod donated by the K-State Student Union Computer Store.

A long line of students and faculty members were ready to eat one of the 700 hot dogs donated for current and potential students in the College of Human Ecology.

"The best part of the event is that the students get to know the department heads," said Cara Richardson, human ecology special-events director. "Human ecology has five very different departments, and it is a good idea for any student or potential student to meet and interact with all of the departments."

The barbecue also was an outlet for students to get involved in human ecology, said Madai Rivera, human ecology academic services and diversity coordinator.

"This is a welcome-back event to get to know more about the College of Human Ecology and to socialize," Rivera said. "At this point, we want to show students that are maybe interested in human ecology to find more information about what major or interest group they would like to join."

Bockers II Catering and Pepsi also sponsor for the event.

After eating hot dogs and chips on the patio, students could go into the lobby for ice cream, raffle prizes and information on different academic majors and interest groups for human ecology.

"We wanted to host an event that brought people that were interested in human ecology together," Rivera said. "We thought that students love free food, and lunch would be a great time to host this event. This barbecue is mostly for the students and to welcome them into the College of Human Ecology."

Mary Cox, freshman in family studies and human services, said she attended the event to learn more about her major.

"It is a great idea to have a barbecue because this college is so spread out," Cox said. "There are lots of majors that are available in this college. It's nice to see the different things you can do."

At next year's barbecue, Rivera said the college would like to encourage more students to look at information inside the lobby of Justin Hall.

"We had ice cream, the raffle and all of the information inside," Rivera said. "We want more people going inside to see really what human ecology is all about."

Improv group to open McCain series

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

New York's longest-running comedy revue will perform at 7:30 tonight in McCain Auditorium.

Chicago City Limits, a seven-member comedy improvisation troupe, will start the 2007-08 McCain Performance Series. A comedy entertainment troupe usually performs in the series every year, said Thom Jackson, McCain marketing and development director.

Chicago City Limits' 90-minute performance will involve audience participation, Jackson said.

"They may ask for a noun or a part of a song title, and that'll spark off their comedy routine," he said. "They'll build a whole scene upon what's given to them by the audience."

In 1977, Chicago City Limits was founded in Chicago and relocated to New York two years later. Its own theater was established in 1980, and it includes a permanent troupe that performs daily.

Jackson said he saw the troupe perform in New York. Audiences will never see the same show twice with Chicago City Limits, he said.

"It's not scripted, so you have no ideas where it's going to go," Jackson said. "Unlike a normal musical or play that has a common theme and songs that are familiar, this is something that's totally off the wall, and it's driven by the audience."

If audience members have not seen comedy improvisation before, Jackson said the experience itself will make the performance interesting.

"It'll give students a chance to relax once again before delving into all of their studies for the next couple of months where they'll be snowed under until midterms," Jackson said.

The troupe also conducted two workshops at K-State and in Manhattan on Thursday, Jackson said. A diversity workshop took place for the College of Business Administration and the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce had a "Laughter in the Workplace" workshop.

The workshops were tailored to use humor to deal with everyday stressful situations, Jackson said.

"With the outreach level, it grows every year because I think there's a nice demand for it," he said. "People would like to interact with the cast members as much as they can, so we try to offer that opportunity when possible."

McCain executive director Todd Holmberg said the performance will resemble "Whose Line Is It Anyway?"

"What I find fascinating is that these performers are performing daredevils," Holmberg said. "They are going to come out on stage, and they are going to be at the mercy of the audience. It's just fascinating how they aren't going to come out with a script."

Annual Labor Fest unites groups to raise awareness about minimum wage laws

By Amanda Keim
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Many students view Labor Day as little more than a day away from crowded classrooms and thick textbooks; however, the Flint Hills Living Wage Coalition, along with other Manhattan organizations taking a stance on the true meaning of the holiday and the people surrounding it.

The coalition, combined with the Manhattan Alliance for Peace and Justice and several Manhattan labor unions, will sponsor the annual Labor Fest which will be in the City Park Pavilion from noon to 2 p.m. Sunday. The festival will feature guest speakers as well as music, food and drinks.

The coalition has existed for eight years and is dedicated to educating Manhattan citizens on the effects of the current minimum wage and how best to get it raised, said John Exdell, a member of the steering committee for the coalition.

"I've been part of this effort for many years, that is, to raise consciousness for better wages for people in Manhattan and everywhere in the nation," Exdell said. "I believe that it is an issue that is not understood and the importance of it is not appreciated."

In order to motivate citizens of Manhattan to fight for increased minimum wage—Kansas is the lowest in the nation at $2.65 per hour—the coalition and supporting groups are hosting a Labor Fest.

"We thought it was important for Manhattan to have some event that occurred on Labor Day weekend that recognized the need for a living wage and would bring together citizens that could then discuss and reflect upon those issues," Exdell said.

Among the guest speakers are three state legislators, representing both republicans and democrats, including Rep. Sydney Carlin, D-Kan.; Sen. Roger Reitz, R-Kan.; and Rep. Tom Hawk, D-Kan.

The fourth speaker, Heidi Zeller, will arrive from Topeka and represent the Kansas Action Network's Raise the Wage Campaign.

The history of Labor Day often is lost in the celebration of having a day free from class and work.

Angela Hubler, member of the coalition, said she thinks that people take the struggles of the past for granted.

"Labor Day was established to represent the labor movement," Hubler said. "A lot of people don't realize that many of the things we take for granted—eight-hour days and weekends—were won by the labor movement. Part of it is celebration, but we also realize new challenges."

Karen Rappoport, member of Citizens for a Better Manhattan, said she believes this festival will help others to understand and benefit from the true spirit of Labor Day.

"This is a Labor Fest to celebrate labor, the role of labor and Labor Day," she said.

Critical scam

K-State does not need bicyclists who cannot follow rules of road

Riding down the street in the sunshine is a wonderful way to spend an afternoon. Bikes have always been a popular form of relaxation and transportation for both children and adults.

BRETT KING

Since construction began on the new parking garage, students and faculty have started riding their bikes as a way to get to and from campus instead of dealing with parking problems.

Other riders feel it is their own way of reducing their carbon footprint on the world.

What many of these self-righteous "environmentalists" forget is the rules of the road still apply to them just as for the fossil-fuel burners.

Kansas statute 8-1587 states, "Every person riding a bicycle upon a roadway shall be granted all of the rights and shall be subject to all of the duties applicable to the driver of a vehicle by this act."

In layman's terms, every stop sign, traffic signal and speed limit expected of drivers is mandatory for bicyclists to follow.

With the laws clearly defined, the police should be prepared tonight to enforce those laws as the Critical Mass prepares to have their first riding event here in Manhattan.

Critical Mass has become the accumulation of many phantom groups, popping up in cities across the country and the world over the past 15 years. Little is known about these groups, except for the problems they have caused in the cities across the globe.

According to www.critical-mass.org, "Critical Mass is not an organization, it's an unorganized coincidence. It's a movement of bicycles, in the streets."

Make no mistake — these are protests held the last Friday of every month, and they have a history of getting unruly.

Each rider participates for his or her own cause, and their linking characteristic is to impede the flow of traffic during peak times of commuting.

On Aug. 12, The Los Angeles Times reported people involved in Critical Mass do not believe they tie up traffic because they are the traffic.

"Their aim is to force cars to share the road and leave enough room for bike lanes, so cyclists won't have to fear injury or death,"

Originally called "Commuter Clot," Critical Mass forces traffic tie-ups through a practice of using some of its participants as "corkers."

Corkers are riders on the flanks, who purposefully block traffic so the group can continue through red lights freely without interference from vehicles.

Even though this is a clear violation of all traffic laws across the country, police have yet to stop the practice.

An April 28 article from the San Francisco Chronicle detailed the account of these militant protesters causing personal property damage to vehicles caught in the middle of their ride.

The militant attitude of "massers" in other cities seems to have manifested itself here in Manhattan. The messages left on the Facebook.com wall announcing this event has hints of lawlessness interlaced in comments.

This community can tolerate many things, but if these bicyclists hope to change the world around them, they better stay in the bike lanes, not impede traffic and follow the rules of the road.

Plan B should be made available to any, all women who need it

Christina Forsberg | COLLEGIAN

One year ago this week, the Food and Drug Administration made Plan B, an emergency contraceptive, available over the counter. The pill, for sale to women age 18 and older, has a cost between $40 and $60, yet people who fall in the demographic sometimes are denied much-needed access.

According to the FDA, anyone more than 18 years old can purchase this drug, while those younger than 18 only have access through a prescription from their doctor or a local clinic. Despite FDA approval, many conservative communities have not only made this pill unavailable for anyone underage, but have also opted to make this drug unavailable to everyone, proving that federal involvement is needed.

This form of contraception is used in an emergency situation, in cases of accidents or sexual assaults. For the pill to be effective, it must be taken within at least 72 hours after the incident.

In some cases, age restrictions are unnecessary and potentially harmful for younger women.

Andrew C. von Eschenbach, commissioner for the FDA, said in a March 2007 press release Plan B's age restriction is based on the time-honored approach of limiting access to some substances to people deemed old enough to use them properly.

Clearly, this age-old practice has not been effective in preventing teens from acquiring cigarettes, aerosol spray paint, cold medicines and porn. So why restrict this important health product from the demographics needing it the most?

The FDA has found no scientific proof Plan B is harmful to people younger than 18. Therefore, the decision to limit who can purchase this drug has become a political issue.

Religious and anti-abortion groups across the country resisted the initiatives to make this drug available for many years.

However, even a year after the FDA approved Plan B for over-the-counter distribution, some pharmacies are not holding up their part of the deal.

Most public corporations have these pills available in their pharmacies. In some small towns and conservative communities, it is nearly impossible for any woman of any age to obtain these pills.

According to the Pharmacy Access Partnership, immigrants, women without proof of age and minors make up the largest demographic of women with the most vulnerable need for these drugs, and they are the least likely to be able to obtain them.

K-State is lucky to have an accommodating medical facility like Lafene Health Center. The Women's Health Center has many counseling options available to women in times of need, as well as the Plan B pill.

Regardless of religious or political affiliation, the moral side of this issue is not the most important factor in this fight.

The most important issue to keep in mind is these pills have been approved by the FDA and deemed safe for women. They have been proven healthy, and women deserve the chance to use them.

The age issue is not something bound to change anytime soon. The government has OK'd the availability for certain women.

Unfortunately, the availability of Plan B still needs to be improved.

This is not something we should let right-wing lobbyists or religious groups control. This should be left strictly to the government and the legislation passed in 2006 backing this drug.

Women's rights have come a long way since their rise in the 1970s. Even with the development of emergency birth control, there is still quite a bit of ground to cover until the advances in medical technology are available to every woman who needs them.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

The Collegian welcomes your letters to the editor. They can be submitted by e-mail to letters@pub.ksu.edu, or in person to Kedzie 116. Please include your full name, year in school and major. Letters should be limited to 250 words. All submitted letters might be edited for length and clarity.

TO THE POINT

Collegian editors to take advantage of one day off from production

After what seemed like a month of classes, meetings, Panda Express and late deadlines, the first two weeks of Collegian production have come to an end.

Since we are college students with the same attention spans and motivation as the rest of you, we support the American institution known as Labor Day.

So, for one last weekend, break out the summer duds, the flip-flops and an ice-cold Corona, because after Monday, the long haul begins.

Here is how the Collegian editors will spend the weekend:

JACQUE HAAG
COPY CHIEF

"I am working at my second job, because $4 an hour at the Collegian won't buy groceries. Hopefully I can sneak peaks at the game while I'm there."

ALEX PEAK
EDITOR IN CHIEF

"I'm not really sure yet what I will do, but I will not be doing anything that involves labor."

WILLOW WILLIAMSON
METRO EDITOR

"I am going to the Kansas City Renaissance Festival."

STEVEN DOLL
PHOTO EDITOR

"I am going to Auburn to cover the game."

ERIC DAVIS
EDGE EDITOR

"I'll be keeping my dad company after his knee-replacement surgery."

BRETT KING
OPINION EDITOR

"I will be heading to Kansas City (Mo.) to attend Irish Fest and watch the game."

BRIDGETTE A. WEST
NEWS EDITOR

"I am going to attempt to catch up on sleep and possibly do a little shopping and game watching."

MIKE KELLY
MULTIMEDIA/ONLINE EDITOR

"I will be recovering after cheering the Cats to victory at Auburn."

KRISTEN HODGES
FEATURES EDITOR

"I plan to go Jet-Skiing and get a tan while boating on the lake. I'm also excited for some home-cooked meals."

JONATHAN GARTEN
MANAGING EDITOR

"I'll be watching the K-State, Auburn game, among other games, and catching up on some sleep. Hopefully I'll be able to get some homework done as well."

ADRIANNE DEWEES
CAMPUS EDITOR

"My too-cool-for-school weekend plans include watching 'The Cosby Show,' listening to hot tracks and spending money that I do not have on clothes and accessories that I do not need. But, above all else, I will be thinking about the Collegian and campus news."

AUSTIN MEEK
SPORTS EDITOR

"I'll be munching ice chips and listening to hip hop to stay awake during the 15-hour trip to and from Auburn."

PARKER ROME
PRESENTATION EDITOR

"I don't plan on leaving my living room at all on Saturday. From noon until after the K-State game, I'm going to watch college football. Then, maybe, I'll have time for homework."

PEOPLE IN THE NEIGHBORHOOD

Senior encourages students to be involved, discusses time management

By Cassandre Braden
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

College students often find it hard to juggle school and work and are left with little time to volunteer on campus or in the community. Joe Vossen, senior in political science, not only has devoted time to the community, but he has done so throughout his four years at K-State. Vossen has been involved in several organizations since his freshman year, and he has advice for students who want to get involved.

Q. What campus organizations have you been involved in?

A. Well, since I've been at K-State I've been involved in Quest Freshman Leadership Honorary, Silver Key Sophomore Leadership Honorary, Phi Kappa Phi and Blue Key Senior Honorary. I've also been a member of the Student Alumni Board and a member of the Pre-Law Society. Also, I have been involved in Student Government all four years.

Q. How soon after enrolling at K-State did you begin to join campus organizations?

A. Right away. The first thing I did when I moved to K-State was apply and get accepted into Quest. I also applied for a Student Senate internship and joined a fraternity that fall.

Q. Did your volunteering begin before arriving at K-State?

A. Yeah, definitely. I had a record of being involved and doing community service before moving up to K-State.

Q. What prompted you to decide to be an active member of campus?

A. Well, my first experiences were so rewarding, so I just kept doing it. All the people I met I liked working with, and I wanted to accomplish more with them.

Q. How did you manage your time between school and everything else?

A. I just had to be able to plan. The biggest part of college is time management. You can be busy if you prioritize. Put first things first, otherwise school will be a nightmare.

Q. What has been your favorite organization you have been involved in so far?

A. I think the thing I learned the most from and impacted the most students was the K-State PROUD Campaign. I felt the effects upon the student body in ways most student campaigns haven't. I had a lot of fun at Bramlage (Coliseum). We taught people about philanthropy. The whole campus saw the results that normally only people in the honorary get to see.

Q. What benefits do you see in volunteering for your community?

A. Well, I've gained skills. I've learned a lot about organizing - I wasn't always organized. I've been forced to pick up those habits. Also, oftentimes when you're working with people, you look alike and act alike. I've enjoyed working with people who have very different views.

Q. What long-term benefits do you see from devoting time to better your surroundings?

A. Friends I've made that I'll know my entire life, and I'm really thankful for that.

Q. What advice do you have for students who are hoping to be more involved?

A. If someone wants to get involved, the best advice I can give them is to talk to your friends. See what they're involved in. If you live in the dorms, check with your resident assistant. If you're in organized living, check with the elder members. People get all caught up thinking that the activities carnival is all K-State offers. All of the organizations I like best I've heard about through friends.

Q. What are your future plans, and where do you hope to see yourself in five years?

A. Next fall I'll be entering law school. I don't know where yet - the application process starts soon. In five years, I hope to be paying off law school debts practicing law.

Q. How do you hope the skills you have gained at K-State will help you in your law career?

A. Legal profession is a type of career that has a lot of influence. At K-State, I've gotten to enact change in my community. I've enjoyed that. I've also gotten a lot of practice in leadership that I hope will help me.

FRIDAY FACTOID

Parking lot once home to barracks with snack bar, ping-pong table

Was there always a parking lot south of the K-State Student Union?

Before the construction of the K-State Student Union in 1956, an old army barracks served as the interim student union from 1947 to 1956.

World War II and the Korean War both delayed construction.

The interim union was located south of the current Union along 17th Street.

Tennis courts were located south of the barracks, along Anderson Avenue and 17th.

The small barracks building included a snack bar, an area to play cards and one ping-pong table.

Don Slater, a former K-State student, estimated a majority of students never even went inside.

The barracks originally were built in 1942 for the Herington (Kan.) Army Air Base.

The barracks and tennis courts were torn down later for extensions of the Union parking lot.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Disaster brewing in KC

In addition to writing for the Collegian, I am also a part-time cook, and a few days ago I cooked up a recipe for disaster I like to call the 2007 Kansas City Chiefs offense.

TRENTON CLIFTON

I started off with a journeyman quarterback. This quarterback lacks agility, quickness and speed. Most recliners at your local furniture store have better arms. I also made sure that the quarterback was in his mid-30s and on the downside of his career. This key ingredient is the starting quarterback for the Chiefs, Damon Huard.

I was careful not to use a young quarterback with a strong arm and a world of potential. Instead, I am going to take the younger quarterback and store him on the shelf for a few years, as the Chiefs have done this year with Brodie Croyle.

Next, I mixed in an offensive line that is more porous than the southern United States border. I made sure the right tackle was undersized and that the line as a whole was inexperienced and lacked any kind of cohesiveness. This terrible offensive line should complement an old, immobile quarterback nicely.

After the offensive line is mixed in well, I sprinkled an untalented receiving corps over the top. I chose a few different types of receivers: one is past his prime and losing his speed (Eddie Kennison), another is an undersized receiver whose hands barely warrant a reserve spot in the Arena Football League (Samie Parker), and last is a talented but raw receiver who has yet to learn to run routes effectively (Dwayne Bowe).

The next part is a bit tricky. You now must add one of the most talented running backs in the National Football League, but you can't just throw him right in. First you must beat him and mash him up quite a bit. This ingredient is Larry Johnson, and the Chiefs beat him up by giving him an NFL-record 416 carries last year. To make sure he and the offensive line are not familiar with each other, I waited until the last possible second to add Larry Johnson. The Chiefs did this by refusing to pay their best player until training camp and the majority of the pre-season were over.

After those ingredients are mixed, throw a great receiving tight end into the bowl. Tony Gonzalez would normally help make this whole contraption less of a disaster, but he'll be seeing double and triple coverage because of the lack of talent around him.

So you can be sure that this recipe is still on its way to a disastrous end.

The Chiefs will not be a playoff team in 2007. They will not even be a good team. I see this team finishing no better than 5-11 and having one of the lowest-scoring offenses Kansas City has ever seen.

CROSS COUNTRY

Racing ahead

COLLEGIAN FILE PHOTO

The cross country team, off of a downer season last year, opens its season this Saturday in Augusta, Kan. Team members are looking forward to using what they learned during training this summer.

Team looks to move higher than 2006 Big 12 standing

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Finishing 12th in the Big 12 Conference wasn't exactly living up to expectations for the men's and women's cross country teams. However, that's where both teams finished last season.

"If you look at our outcomes in the Big 12 the last two years, you would say we bottomed out," said coach Michael Smith.

The best outcome for the Wildcats last year was a third and fourth-place finish for the men and women, respectively, at the Bob Timmons Invitational in Lawrence.

Both teams fell to Kansas in a home duel with the Jayhawks.

But since the beginning of the summer, both teams have been committed to erasing those bad memories, Smith said. He said he was especially impressed by the women's team, which practiced together all summer.

"You can run anywhere, but they were able to run together," he said. "I think that made it a great environment for them."

They understand how hard they have to work. Last year was an eye-opener for the young ones, and they stayed here this summer and worked together and that elevated their level."

Wichita State will be host to the J.K. Gold Classic in Augusta, Kan., where this summer's work will be tested in the Wildcats' first invitational Saturday. Junior Lil-iani Mendez said the team's goal is to place in the top eight at the Big 12 Championships Oct. 26 in Lubbock, Texas, and that seeing the girls work hard is encouraging for everyone.

"Compared with last year, we've gained experience in every race and every course, and it gave us a lot of strength," Mendez said. "As a team, our goal is to keep improving. We're excited from having good girls that joined the team that have been working hard."

Morgan Bonds, who also competes with the track team, is one of two seniors on the cross country squad.

However, the men's squad is comprised of two sophomores and four juniors, including junior Alex Umberger, who said he is looking forward to improving on last season's performance.

"We have the people this year, and we're going to make due with that," Umberger said. "Any time you go into a new season, you're always looking to do better."

Smith said he will to both Mendez and Umberger to provide leadership for the younger runners. He said he already can see progress in those who trained this summer.

"The most important thing in this sport is how much training you did in the summer before the season," he said. "I expect the others to step it up. You can see it in the women's group — people are fighting now. A year ago, people were just running."

SEASON OUTLOOK

Coach:

Michael Smith (13th season)

2006 Finish:

Men — 12th in the Big 12

Women — 12th in the Big 12

Familiar faces:

Men — Alex Umberger, Jason Collett, Danny Schneider

Women — Morgan Bonds, Emily Dittmore, Liliani Mendez

Newcomers to watch:

Men — Tyler Fennema, Samuel James

Women — Megan-Anne Perrin, Lindsay Pierson

Schedule:

Sept. 1: J.K. Gold Classic, Augusta, Kan.

Sept. 7: K-State/KU Duel, Manhattan

Sept. 15: Woody Greeno Invitational, Lincoln, Neb.

Sept. 29: Roy Griak Invitational, Minneapolis

Oct. 13: Pre-NCAA Championships, Terre Haute, Ind.

Oct. 26: Big 12 Championships, Lubbock, Texas

Nov. 10: Midwest Region Championships, Peoria, Ill.

Nov. 19: NCAA Championships, Terre Haute, Ind.

Three questions:

1. Can the men and the women finish higher than last in the Big 12 this year?

2. Will the extra work this summer by the women's squad pay off this year?

3. Can Alex Umberger, Liliani Mendez and Morgan Bonds all have a positive effect on the team?

Volleyball team travels to Hawaii invitational to face more ranked opponents

By Jonathan Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Winning won't be the only objective for the No. 25 Wildcats as they travel to the Hawaiian Airlines Rainbow Wahine Classic this weekend, coach Suzie Fritz said.

"I like to win — don't get me wrong. But right now I just want to play well," Fritz said. "I want to stay sharp, and I want to stay focused from the start to the finish of a match."

Tonight K-State (14-0) will attack No. 16 Hawaii (1-2), which recently lost to No. 20 Michigan and Oregon State in the ASICS Rainbow Wahine Invitational. Hawaii's only victory of the season was over Colorado State.

Fritz said the Wildcats will face stiff competition in Hawaii, and she is pleased with the opportunity to play ranked opponents.

"This will be by far our toughest test to this point. It was designed that way," Fritz said. "We wanted an opportunity to play and get some competitive matches under our belt and get a real test to see where we line up."

Saturday, the Wildcats will play Louisville (3-0), which has gathered wins against Memphis, Coastal Carolina and Tennessee Tech. Louisville has not cracked the Top 25 but is receiving votes.

Fritz said her squad does not feel anxious about playing in front of a large crowd and will handle the pressure well.

"I think the girls are excited to play in a competitive environment. Hawaii has one of the best environments in NCAA women's volleyball," Fritz said. "I would suspect there will be about 10,000 fans there. It's not a hostile environment. There are just a lot of them."

Sunday, K-State will face its highest-ranked opponent of the season, No. 5 UCLA (1-1). The Bruins' only loss of the season was to No. 1 Nebraska at the AVCA College Volleyball Showcase. UCLA defeated Utah to mark its lone victory.

Senior captain Angie Lastra is one of the Wildcats looking forward to the challenge of the tournament.

"We are going to play some great teams in Hawaii," Lastra said. "It will make us a lot better after playing these teams."

Julianne Chisholm spikes a ball during a 3-0 win against Houston Tuesday.

Former K-State forward lands at Indiana-Purdue Fort Wayne

STAFF REPORT

Former K-State forward Deilvez Yearby has found a new home.

Yearby, who played two seasons in Manhattan, has transferred to Indiana-Purdue Fort Wayne, the school announced Wednesday.

The 6-foot-6 forward from Detroit will have two years of eligibility remaining after sitting out the upcoming season.

"We are delighted to have Deilvez join our program," said IPFW coach Dane Fife. "Having played for two seasons in the highly competitive Big 12, we will look for him, along with our seniors, to provide the necessary leadership to our younger players."

If Deilvez puts in the time and effort, the sky is the limit for this young man."

Yearby appeared in 11 games last season, averaging 0.8 points and 0.5 rebounds.

As a freshman, he saw action in 14 contests, averaging 1.6 points and 0.9 rebounds.

A three-year letterwinner at Central High School in Detroit, Yearby averaged 21.4 ppg and 12.1 rpg during his senior season. He also posted 20 double-doubles.

Trendy button-up coats come in bright colors, different lengths and new styles to add to a winter wardrobe. Also adding accessories to the coats completes the back-to-winter look.

Updated trench, pea coats to be popular again this fall

Though it might seem hard to believe in the August heat, coat and jacket season is just around the corner.

This fall, you can make bundling up a fashion statement rather than a necessity.

The best part of wrapping yourself around this trend early – even though the very thought of buttoning a coat right now makes you perspire – is that it's easy on your pocket. Many department and chain stores already are stocking their racks with scarves, gloves and jackets for a bundle less than the selling price. These items will go far in the dead of the fall and winter seasons.

One of the biggest coats – literally – on fall fashion runways is the trench. Available in varying lengths, this coat works for every body type.

For a lean and modern look, trench coats are the coming season's best bet. They are a trendy yet practical option for quick walks to work or business meetings.

Buttons fastened, these coats have a tendency to disguise figures and look frumpy. But with the tie of a belt, the problem is solved. Cinching a hook, tie or latch belt around the midsection flatters every woman's figure by defining her waist and accentuating her curves. Most trenches already come with belts, but to spice up your look try clasping last season's thick, brightly colored waist-belts over a solid or patterned trench.

Slim to medium figures look great in an ankle to calf-length trench, while medium to full figures look best in thigh to hip-length trenches.

Another cozy trend this season is the lumberjack-meets-Burberry pattern. Plaids have been popping up all over runways and are a sophisticated and chic print, especially on pea coats.

Pea coats are most obviously recognized as double-breasted, button-up jackets first made popular by sailors in the 1940s. For decades, these coats have existed in solid, cool tones such as navy, hunter and mauve. Very rarely could one ever spot a patterned pea coat, with the exception of the timeless black and white hound's tooth. But the latest and greatest for the pea coat is a colorful plaid.

These coats are also available in a variety of styles including the classic six-button, the swingy baby-doll and the button-up turtleneck that leaves the coat open from the waist down.

A thick-knit scarf, chunky or stiletto knee-high boots and/or a skinny to wide belt are also a must for heating up your jacket-savvy wardrobe this coming season. And remember, if you can only pick one practical-yet-popular look to keep you toasty and trendy while trudging to biology in the snow, make it the trench or patterned pea coat.

Sober speech is appropriate

It's Friday night, and in my eyes the weekend consists of booze, bars and craziness. The students you see studying intensely at Hale Library are the same students I can see dancing the night away on the bars with a Bud Light in their hand.

JACQUELINE WHITE

I have a different perspective of Friday nights. I am the person that dispenses the friendliness, honesty and sometimes rudeness in people, I am a cocktail waitress at the Salty Rim.

I see an entirely different side of college life on my side of the bar. Don't get me wrong – I love to go out and have a great time. But sometimes the unique aspect I am subjected to on Friday nights is not glamorous.

Most nights I get hit on by sloppy, wasted college guys who think that is the way to impress a lady.

I see this way too often, and at times, it's unbearable.

Being approached when sober is an amazing thing. However, when there is alcohol running through the bloodstream of the pursuer, it is more of a turnoff and rather disgusting.

The No. 1 reason it is gross is guys usually say something that does not make sense, or they will throw out an overused pickup line.

A slurred, "I'll give you a nickel if you tickle my pickle," is definitely not going to get you any sober lady worth taking home to mother.

The second reason why being drunk and hitting on a lady is bad is the vibe that comes off is overly aggressive.

Why do I want a drunk guy stuttering in my face, telling me how great I look while his eyes are looking down the whole time?

The third reason why getting hit on at the bar is a turnoff is because it is awkward. I am in a position where I want to kick the guy in places that hurt, or try to laugh it off.

The most awkward situation I encounter is when the guy follows me around and offers to buy drinks. Side note: buying alcohol for someone else does not make you more appealing.

I am not discounting the fact that relationships can be formed from meetings in bars and parties, but what are you supposed to do when you find the love of your life at the bar or a party?

My solution? Ask a friend for help. Make sure you approach him or her in the same manner you would if you were not out drinking. Maybe that somebody you see now is not really what you like on Monday afternoons.

If so, approach them in a nice manner and please make sure you can speak clearly. Don't use a pickup line, and don't offer a drink. Instead, be clear, subtle and straight to the point.

If you want my number, that is the way to get it.

Manhattan youth sports teams seek volunteer head coaches

By Whitney Hodgins
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Department of Parks and Recreation needs to fill more than 20 head coaching positions for youth soccer, flag football and volleyball leagues by the time practices begin next week.

Anyone interested and able to coach children between the ages of seven and 14 is encouraged to volunteer for the fall season.

Six soccer coaches, nine flag football coaches and six volleyball coaches are needed.

Teams generally have two practices and one game per week until the season ends Nov. 1, so volunteers should expect to dedicate about four to six hours to coaching a week, said Kelly Walters, assistant recreation superintendent.

"Coaches are responsible for organizing and scheduling practices and distributing game schedules to parents and players," Walters said. "Most of the coaches are parents, but a lot of college students volunteer because they play the sport themselves and don't mind spending a few hours a week showing kids how to enjoy it, too."

A National Youth Sports Coaching Association clinic will be available to familiarize volunteers with their leadership roles before games begin.

The coaching certification program covers areas of psychology, teaching techniques, child abuse and legal activities, according to the Parks and Recreation Web site.

Cody Decker, junior in parks management, volunteered to coach fifth- and sixth-grade soccer after a professor announced the staff shortage in class.

"This job will take care of about a third of the recreation leadership points I need for that class," Decker said. "That was the deciding factor for me, but I also think it would be fun to help kids who already have an interest in soccer improve their skills. Soccer's my sport!"

Walters said head coaches are responsible for finding their own assistant coaches.

"There are several teams that still don't have coaches, so anyone with a background in the sport who enjoys kids and has some degree of patience should consider helping out," Decker said.

Molly Robinson, fifth-year student in marketing, said students who need to fulfill community-service hours would benefit from such an easy job.

Robinson volunteered to coach third- and fourth-grade girls' soccer for the first time three seasons ago after seeing the job posting on her sorority's listserve.

"All you need to know are the rules of the game," she said. "The kids think you're really cool and look up to you, which makes it easy to show up to practices and a game three times a week."

Interested parties should contact Mike Buchanan or Kelly Walters at the Department of Parks and Recreation at (785) 587-2757.

SCALPING | Legalization not predicted to increase ticket resales

because of the overwhelming support from performance arenas, legislators, entertainers, athletes and the public. In Missouri and 13 other states, scalping is still a misdemeanor.

If the law were repealed, it could make it easier for K-State students to buy tickets right before a concert.

Municipal laws against scalping are still in effect though the state has made the practice legal. For example, ticketholders for K-State sporting events can resell their seats online or face-to-face, but not on the grounds of Snyder Family Stadium. The stadium policy on solicitation prohibits the sale of tickets and can cite violators for trespassing.

"I tried selling tickets at a football game for the same price I paid for them," said Justin Stiles, fifth-year student in secondary education. "But stadium security told me I had to leave the area and stop selling them. Apparently, you can't sell tickets, even at face value, on state property."

Robin Fosha, ticket office director at Bill Snyder Family Stadium, said campus policy was changed about four years ago to require scalpers to stay across the street from the stadium when selling.

"Scalping has been much less of a problem since the K-State police force became more diligent," Fosha said. "By physically removing the scalpers, they lost a lot of their business, so there was less of a reason for them to scalp."

K-State Police Cap. Don Stubbings said moving the problem away from the box office serves two purposes. One is traffic control, since fans will pull over on Kimball Avenue to solicit scalpers and slow street flow.

Another purpose for enforcing solicitation laws is that it is economic in nature.

"When scalpers are near crowds selling the same tickets at a lower price, the athletic department suffers," he said. "But there hasn't been a big problem with repeat offenders on campus. We usually only have to warn them once."

In Missouri, sellers can be fined up to $100 and jailed for 15 days to a year if caught.

Tickets to popular events regularly are sold for 10 times their original price on Web sites like www.ticketmaster.com and www.ebay.com, which auctions tickets to the highest bidder.

The sites use supply and demand to provide a competitive marketplace for resellers, said Joe Freeman, vice president of Ticketmaster, which publicly supports the Missouri repeal.

"Ideal legislation has consumer protections in place, creates a level playing field for everyone in the reselling market and strives to maximize the opportunities for consumers to get a shot at tickets in the primary market at face value," he said in an Aug. 6 article in USA Today.

Advocates say ticket prices in Missouri will decrease once scalping is legalized because of the principle of supply and demand.

Stubbings said the Web site www.StubHub.com, which is owned by Ebay, provides people with a university-approved ticket broker through which they can sell their tickets.

"Legalization probably won't increase the occurrence of scalping in Missouri," Stubbings said. "But it will help regulate it. Prices will go down for tickets to less popular games and will raise for the high-demand ones."

Opponents of the repeal say controversy lies not within the act of scalping, but instead in Blunt's incentive to legalize it. His brother, Andy, is the Missouri lobbyist for Ticketmaster, and according to an Aug. 27 article from the Associated Press, the company acknowledged its potential to benefit from the repeal.

Freeman, however, said Andy does not deal with the executive branch of state government — only with lawmakers.

unless you have a facility like this one."

Stack said one of the main areas of research at the BRI will be the development of plant-based vaccines, which incorporate disease antigens purified and removed from plants. He said these vaccines are cheap and have few side-effects on people.

From student access to researching to bringing in high-profile scientists, Stack said the BRI will be an asset to the Manhattan and K-State communities.

One advantage of the institute will be the influx of highly regarded professors and researchers. Juergen Richt, lead scientist with the U.S. Department of Agriculture's National Animal Disease Center, was hired last week as a Regents Distinguished Professor. A renowned veterinary microbiologist, Richt plans to set up a new research program at the BRI.

"The fact that we're able to attract scientists like him, I would say that's one of the big benefits," Jaax said. "It's a magnet for these kind of people who are looking for special capabilities for programs you couldn't do in a lot of places."

Recently, the BRI has been overshadowed by the possibility of the National Bio and Agro-Defense Facility that might come to K-State. K-State is one of six final site proposals for the NBAF. The Department of Homeland Security will make its final decision in October 2008, and construction would be complete in 2013. Trewyn said the existence of the BRI increases the chances of attracting the NBAF.

Stack said the NBAF would not hurt the BRI. He said he hoped the institute could work closely with the NBAF to do preliminary and follow-up research and testing.

"That facility is going to be almost five times larger than ours, so we're not going to be competing with them in any sense," he said.

Stack said he believes the BRI is the largest non-governmental animal-research facility in the United States. Because of the multi-functional nature of the facility, Stack also said it was special to Kansas and the United States.

Stack said the facility would allow for a wide range of research in a world of growing biological threats.

The rise of bio-terrorism and the increase of population migration are two of many motivators for research at the BRI, he said.

"I believe we need to do this," Stack said. "We need this capability nationally, and I think we are going to continue to see threats with the introduction of organisms as consequence of the increase of trade and the increase of people moving around the globe."

to strengthen the presence of SGA on campus.

The program is designed to bring together 11 senators from the executive and legislative branches of the SGA, plus three interns, to improve communication between the senate and more than 460 K-State student organizations.

The idea is that representatives from each college and organization will have more opportunities to speak directly to the senate, rather than relying on less reliable communication routes.

"In the past, SGA hasn't been speaking directly to the students," said Taylor Symons, SGA ambassador director and junior in speech communications.

"No one had the facts or information they needed unless they came to us, but now we are going to go to them."

LOOKING FORWARD

"I've never been comfortable in my life ... I don't think it's fair to the people of this state to have a team that ever thinks it's arrived. That's how I come to work every day – I don't even drive the same route every day. It's not necessarily paranoia, but I'm never comfortable."

OFF THE FIELD | CEDRIC WILSON

Cedric Wilson likes to keep to himself, but that didn't mean he wouldn't open up a little for this week's Off the Field segment. The junior wide receiver from Fort Pierce, Fla., is most remembered for catching a touchdown from running back Leon Patton in last season's 45-42 upset of Texas. Wilson grew up the second youngest of seven children, and with four brothers and two sisters, he never had to worry about getting lonely. When he was in middle school he started writing poetry, and it's an interest that has stayed with him through college.

Q. What was it like growing up with six brothers and sisters?

A. That was rough, but at the same time it was good because you always had somebody around. You always had a family member there when you needed to talk to someone, and that kind of kept your confidence up.

Q. Are your siblings as athletic as you?

A. They started out athletic until they all got to the college level. Then everybody started going their separate ways. None of them played anything in college. Baseball was my first love. I played baseball all through high school, and I just started playing football in high school. It's been a family tradition for us to play baseball. My dad just wanted to keep us active and didn't want us to be doing the wrong thing.

Q. What position did you play?

A. I pitched and played in the outfield. Centerfield mostly.

Q. I heard that you like poetry. Is that true?

A. Yeah, I like poetry. I like to write a lot. I don't read other poetry as much, but I like making up my own poetry.

Q. Do you have any favorite poets?

A. Well, not really. Back in the day, I used to always look at Edgar Allan Poe stuff, but that's more short stories ... I've written quite a few poems. Somebody tells me what they want a poem about and I do my best to try to meet their expectations.

Q. When did you start writing?

A. I've always had a broad imagination, so I always liked to write back when I was in middle school. I used to like to draw, and every picture I drew, I'd always write a poem with it. That's how it started.

Q. What was it like adjusting to Kansas from Florida?

A. It was real hard knowing that where I came from is really different. The people are way nicer up here than at home.

And the weather change...

Q. What did you do the first time it snowed here?

A. I'm not going to lie, I wanted it to snow because of the fact that I'd never seen snow before. And then it snowed and I was like, 'Oh, this isn't what I wanted.'

Q. What kind of music do you listen to?

A. I listen to rap music. Depending on who I'm around, I always tell them to be themselves and listen to what music they want to listen to. I'm really not picky about which music I listen to because I'll listen to anything.

Q. Who are some of your favorite rap artists?

A. I don't have a favorite rap artist. I just listen to it all.

Q. Not even (wide receiver/returner) Deon Murphy?

A. (Laughing) Yeah, he did pretty good up there, I thought. He did alright.

Q. What's your favorite moment at K-State so far?

A. When I scored that touchdown against Texas. That was a moment I'll never forget. I never thought my first touchdown would be against Texas, or from a running back.

Q. What do you think of the Texas students' Facebook.com group about blacking out the stadium on Sept. 29 when you play in Austin?

A. All I can say is we played our hearts out to win that game. They played their hearts out. They came here not expecting what we were going to do. If they want to make that stuff up, we can go there and make the same appearance and make the same thing happen if everybody plays hard.

Q. What's your favorite place to hang out in Manhattan?

A. My favorite place to hang out is (my house). I'm not a person that likes to put myself out in the public. I just try to keep to myself most of the time ... (I live with) some guys from (Garden City Community College). There's no football players.

— Nick Dunn

KANSAS STATE

AUBURN

OFFENSE

K-State has the daunting task of opening its season against last year's No. 7-ranked defense in points allowed per game. Quarterback Josh Freeman must get rid of the football quickly to avoid the two standouts in Auburn's secondary. If running back James Johnson can find some holes early, it will open up more opportunities for Freeman to attack the Tigers through the air.

With four new starters on the offensive line, the Tigers will expect big plays from senior quarterback Brandon Cox. Cox managed to lead his team to 11 wins last year despite being plagued by injury. Brad Lester, who led the Tigers in rushing touchdowns with nine in limited time in 2006, could establish his position as one of the next great Auburn running backs of the last decade.

DEFENSE

K-State needs to exploit the inexperience of the Tigers' offensive line and put as much pressure on Tigers' quarterback Brandon Cox as possible. Look for Ian Campbell to chase down the somewhat-immobile Cox from his new position at outside linebacker. The secondary must protect against the big-play potential of Auburn receiver Rod Smith. The first test for defensive coordinator Tim Tibesar's new 3-4 scheme is bound to be an interesting one.

The Tigers start the 2007 season with one of the most experienced defenses in the nation. Auburn returns seven starters from a defense that allowed only 13.9 points per game. Expect Auburn's secondary experience to pay great dividends in collapsing the passing lanes, limiting the K-State air attack. The Tigers, led by senior defensive end Quentin Groves, probably will concentrate on forcing Freeman to make quick decisions in the pocket.

SPECIAL TEAMS

K-State is coming off a year in which they led the nation in yards per kick return and scored an impressive six special-teams touchdowns. New special-teams coach Matt Wallerstedt is hoping to keep the return game a tremendous strength. He might have found the next star in junior-college transfer Deon Murphy. In a close game, though, the inexperience at kicker could prove to be crucial.

With last year's starting place kicker and punter gone, Auburn's kicking game is left with a huge question mark. It will be interesting to see if the Tigers will take more risks than necessary on fourth-and-short situations due to their kicking inexperience. Ron Prince preaches the importance of field position, an area where K-State could take advantage.

PREDICTION

Aside from the win at Colorado last season, K-State struggled to win on the road. The Wildcats need to prove they can play well away from Manhattan, and winning at Auburn would certainly make a statement. Facing a defense of this caliber in an environment like Jordan-Hare Stadium makes this game seem insurmountable, but if K-State can exploit the inexperience of the Tigers' offensive line, this game could be a lot closer than it appears on paper.

Said Pinkel: "I think anytime you look at preseason picks, I've always thought as coaches maybe we're gaining a little bit of respect. But ultimately, to receive the respect, you have to win at a higher level than we've done. That being said, we're just going to focus and work hard and would like to make (finishing No. 1) come true."

Prince, Freeman look to improve in 2nd year

By Jeffrey Rake
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ron Prince says he tries to be the same man every day.

It is a trait that's become embedded into his coaching philosophy from all the years he's worked as an assistant.

Yet everything, it seems, continues to change around him.

Start with the players. Prince unexpectedly lost a couple of upperclassmen in training camp — first junior Alphonso Moran and then sophomore Derek Meyer, who decided to leave last week.

Before that it was his coaching staff, which underwent a bit of a makeover shortly after the 2006 season ended.

His top defensive assistant, coordinator Raheem Morris, left to take a job in the NFL after just one year in Manhattan.

Even the uniforms, which went untouched for 18 years, have a different look. The double stripes on each shoulder are gone, the word "K-State" has been added to the front and the jersey now has a tighter fit.

But through all the changes, there's still been a mighty constant — one that gives Prince hope as his team takes the field for the season opener on Saturday against 18th-ranked Auburn: Josh Freeman.

The sophomore quarterback, Prince's top recruit from a year ago, is the player who has been — fair or not — assigned the task of leading K-State back to prominence.

"He's been very impressive," said Prince, whose team is trying to build off last year's 7-6 record. "The first thing that everyone concedes is that in big games he's very poised. He has the ability both with his arms and legs to do well."

Freeman's freshman campaign began with promise. After taking over as the team's starter following the fifth game, he led K-State to a pair of home wins against Oklahoma State and Texas. His performance against the Longhorns earned him Big 12 Player of the Week honors.

Still, despite all the highs,

Freeman was hardly immune to the lows. He threw zero touchdowns and five interceptions in his final two games in 2006 — both losses — raising his season interception total to 15.

This season, Freeman said, he needs to be more careful with the football and make better decisions.

That's not to say he won't have opportunities to throw downfield, rather, he'll have to be more calculated in deciding which risks are worth the reward.

"I'm not gonna lie — I like to throw deep; I like to take shots," Freeman said. "But in the long run, it really comes down to completion percentage and keeping the chains moving. It's something I worked on a lot this offseason."

He also spent significant time working with his teammates, something he couldn't do exclusively a year ago while backing up former quarterback Dylan Meier, who has since graduated. The result has been a better understanding of his teammates and a greater chemistry.

"It makes a big difference knowing who's going to be throwing us the ball," senior wide receiver Daniel Gonzalez said. "I think last year we came a long way from him just starting for us. This offseason we're constantly, all of us together, working as a unit."

That doesn't mean it's all been positive. A summer training camp that many seniors called the toughest they've been through since arriving at K-State seemed to, at times, take its toll on Freeman.

He failed his pre-camp conditioning test, which kept him out of practice for two days before he finally passed. Two weeks later in an open practice on Aug. 18, Freeman didn't complete a single pass in 11-on-11 drills.

But through it all, Prince said the whole offseason program — and everything he and the coaches put Freeman through — was worth it. He believes his quarterback will enter the 2007 season a better player.

"He's come out of this very mentally strong and confident in what he can do," Prince said.

BCS teams can learn from 2004 Tigers

It probably isn't much consolation to their fans, but years from now, when we look back on the 2004 Auburn football team, I think we'll remember them as the team that helped college football take the next step.

JEFFREY RAKE

Well, assuming fan types don't get their way and we end up with a crummy playoff system.

For our readers that aren't aware of what happened to Auburn that fateful year, let's provide a quick recap.

— Auburn finished the regular season with a perfect 11-0 record.

— Auburn won the Southeastern Conference title.

— Auburn did not get a chance to compete for the BCS title game.

— Controversy ensued.

Two other teams, USC and Oklahoma, finished undefeated that year. More importantly, however, both teams were ranked higher than Auburn in the BCS computer rankings.

Now, there are plenty of games out there that allow for more than two teams. Take, for instance, a three-legged race. Unfortunately for Auburn though, football is a head-to-head game.

So there was Auburn, the unlucky team, pouting and complaining because it did not get a chance to compete for a title. Did they have a case? Yes, they did. Could they have made a stronger one? Absolutely.

The Tigers wasted their non-conference schedule that year by playing opponents who didn't have the talent to hang with their scout team. Surely they didn't think Louisiana-Monroe, The Citadel and Louisiana Tech would provide much of a challenge. If so, they were clearly mistaken.

Instead, Auburn probably thought it could scoop up three easy wins and inch its way closer to a perfect season. And that's precisely the problem. That's how most every team thinks.

A playoff system, if such a thing ever were adopted, would only encourage teams to schedule pushover non-conference games. It also would reward teams for playing a soft schedule.

In a four- or eight-team playoff system — or 16 teams if you really want to stretch it out — schools typically ranked in the pre-season polls wouldn't have to strain themselves. It would serve a team no purpose to prove themselves against non-conference opponents when they could simply settle for something less. Like fifth, or sixth. Or 10th.

A playoff system encourages mediocrity. The BCS promotes competition.

Yet year after year, college football finds itself in the same predicament because teams want to take the easy path to the top. Teams try to put up a respectable record against their own conference while ignoring the non-conference part of the schedule.

As the 2004 Auburn team found out, that doesn't always work. And rather than complain about the current BCS system, it would be nice to see teams use it to their advantage.

The BCS can help teams stand out from each other by placing an emphasis on strength of schedule. That means a more competitive regular season filled with intriguing matchups.

Let's hope that someday, in light of the 2004 Auburn team, schools will give the BCS an opportunity to help grow the sport.

K-State defensive tackle to face high-school teammates at Auburn

By Ryne Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Redshirt freshman defensive tackle Gabriel Crews might see two familiar faces on the other side of the line Saturday.

Crews went to Lovejoy High School in Hampton, Ga., with two of Auburn's redshirt freshmen who are expected to make contributions: running back Mario Fannin and guard Byron Isom.

There they played for coach Al Hughes. They and several other former players have stayed in contact with their former coach.

"They all like to check in," Hughes said, "and when they are in town, they all like to come by. I always set them up a time to speak to our team about Wildcat Pride and what it's like at the next level."

Hughes has had players go all around the country, so it is not unusual for his former players to play against each other.

"There has been the usual teasing going on between Gabe, Mario and Lee (Byron) Isom," Hughes said.

Crews was hearing it too.

"They think we are just going to come in there and let them whoop us," Crews said. "I told them it's not going to be like that. If they take us too lightly, then we will do them like we did Texas."

Hughes isn't taking sides. He has been through this too many times.

"It seems like every week someone is trying to make you pick sides," he said. "We just try and be supportive of our guys to play and do well as an individual."

Crews' senior class included eight Division-I players.

"It was probably the most challenging season I have had as a coach," Hughes said. "We just didn't have enough footballs to go around."

Hughes said the players got along pretty well. Players were surrounded by supportive families and tried their best to push each other. Fannin, Isom and Crews still help out their former school.

"They communicate with other players all the time on the phone, especially some of our young and upcoming talented players here at Lovejoy," Hughes said.

Crews said his favorite memory from high school was one of the traditions the Lovejoy Wildcats had. It was called the "Cat Walk."

The players would walk in a single-file line from the school to the stadium, which was about 100 yards. With about 100 players in uniform, it was usually a pretty long line.

Then they would walk through the stadium and go to the opposite goal posts. There, they would pray together before the game.

Crews said he plans to get as many tickets as possible for the game on Saturday for his family and friends, where they will be joined by Hughes.

"(Isom) actually called me about a month ago and told me he wanted to be the first to leave me some tickets to attend the game," Hughes said.

Crews is excited for the game.

"The nation doesn't know about K-State," he said. "I want to prove we can compete on a big level."

"(Auburn) is a good test, and I want to pass it. We all do."

KEYS TO VICTORY

1. KEEP SPECIAL TEAMS SPECIAL

K-State's special teams scored six touchdowns last season and averaged 27.1 yards per kick return and 13 yards per punt return. However, those numbers were helped along by former return specialist Yamon Figurs, who has moved on to the NFL. If his replacement, junior Deon Murphy, provides a spark against Auburn, the Wildcats' offense will be blowing him kisses on the sideline.

2. SEND GROVES TO THE GRAVE

Auburn's defense features senior standout Quentin Groves, an All-SEC First Team selection, who coach Ron Prince compared to NFL players like Julius Peppers and Mario Williams. If K-State's offensive line is unable to keep the 6-foot-3, 254-pounder away from quarterback Josh Freeman, the Wildcats' offense might be in for a long day.

3. HE'S THE (ROSS)MAN

After earning the job as K-State's starting kicker, Brooks Rossman must now prove he's a worthy selection. What better time than the season opener? If Auburn's stingy defense keeps the Wildcats away from the goal line, Rossman might be called upon to convert some long field goals. Making his kicks would be a great way to show Prince appreciation for giving him the chance.

4. FEED THE RUNNING BACKS

Running backs Leon Patton and James Johnson proved their worth in 2006, combining for 1,112 yards rushing. K-State will need the duo to keep up the production, especially against Auburn, whose defense will try to force K-State to beat them through the air. Running the ball effectively is a recipe for success on the road, something K-State found out the hard way last season.

5. STOP BREAKING THE LAW

K-State tight end Rashaad Norwood has been suspended from the team because of a domestic dispute and will not make it on the field against Auburn. The Wildcats did not do much better on the field last season, committing 89 penalties for 732 yards. K-State won't be able to overcome penalties at Jordan-Hare Stadium, one of the SEC's most intimidating venues.

Faithful Auburn fans consistently fill Jordan-Hare Stadium

By Mike DeVader
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Not even the threat of a natural disaster can keep Auburn fans from attending home games at Jordan-Hare Stadium.

At least that was the case in 2004, when Hurricane Ivan moved its way into Alabama off the southern coast.

Despite the potential danger, Auburn fans held tight to their tickets to see the Tigers defeat Southeastern Conference rival LSU. The game had a sell-out crowd of more than 85,000.

Luckily for the Auburn faithful, Ivan arrived a few days early, and university officials did not have to cancel the game.

"No matter what kind of bad weather is involved, if the Auburn game is close, fans are going to stay to watch their team," said Cled Evans, manager of Loco's Grill and Pub in Auburn.

Traditions have a rich history for Auburn and the surrounding community. Among those traditions is the Tiger Walk, a ritual that began in the early 1960s as players would walk across the street and up through the stadium.

Today, this has become such a significant gameday event that it is actually a part of the players' itinerary, meaning players need to be ready to participate two hours prior to kickoff.

Since 2000, the team has entered the stadium through the middle of the south end zone, which is surrounded by a cloud of smoke.

Tigers fans are also known for their spirited postgame celebrations. After each game, fans gather at the corner of Toomer's Drug Store, which is on the edge of campus. When Auburn wins, people throw toilet paper around trees and other stationary objects. In Auburn they call this "rolling." One of the most famous "rolled" items is the big oak tree in the middle of town.

Since Jordan-Hare opened in 1939, Auburn has had one of the best attendance records in the SEC, drawing an average of 58,379 fans.

Auburn has also been successful in recent years, posting a 91-44 record since 1996. However, the program hasn't always been on such stable ground.

In 1993, Auburn was banned from postseason play for two years after being hit with NCAA sanctions. Auburn coaches and boosters were found guilty of giving large amounts of money to student athletes. At some schools, a situation like that might hurt fans' morale and attendance, but at Auburn the attendance actually increased.

In fact, it leaped from 72,936 in 1992 to 81,200 in the years following the violations.

Even through a time of hardship, Auburn fans still remained loyal to their team.

The loyalty of Tigers fans even trickles all the way to Manhattan. Kevin Ingram, an Auburn fan from birth and president of Manhattan Christian College, said Tigers fans are among the most passionate he has ever seen. Despite making his living here in Manhattan, he is still very much committed to Auburn.

Todd J. Van Emst | AUBURN MEDIA RELATIONS

Auburn's Jordan-Hare Stadium, which opened in 1939, seats 85,612 fans.

"I guess it is my Southern roots," said Ingram, who is originally from Mobile, Ala. "Auburn is one of the most passionate schools about football out there."

Veteran beat reporter discusses Auburn's strengths, weaknesses

By Nick Dunn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Phillip Marshall covers Auburn for The Huntsville (Ala.) Times. He has spent more than 37 years writing sports for Alabama newspapers and in 2006 was named the National Sportswriters and Sportscasters Association Alabama Sportswriter of the Year. Recently Marshall spoke to the Collegian about Auburn's outlook for 2007.

Q: The Tigers' defense ranked seventh in the nation last year in points allowed per game but lost a few key contributors. With that said, are the pieces still there to keep this a top-10 unit?

A: Last year's defense was solid but not great. It had its rough moments, particularly against Arkansas and Georgia. With (coordinator) Will Muschamp going into his second season, this year's defense should be more consistent.

It is definitely more talented across the board.

Q: What departed player — offensive or defensive — from last year will be the toughest for the team to replace?

A: I would say offensive guard Ben Grubbs, who was a first-round NFL draft pick, with wide receiver Courtney Taylor a close second. If Kenny Irons had been healthy, he probably would have been the toughest to replace. But he played most of last season at probably about 75 percent of the year before.

Q: What are some reasonable expectations for quarterback Brandon Cox in his senior season?

A: Since 1976, no senior returning starter at quarterback has won fewer than eight games for Auburn. All but two have won nine or more and two have had unbeaten seasons. Cox was considered a contender for All-SEC honors before last season. Despite playing hurt, he still helped his team win 11 games. Why he is not getting more respect, I don't know.

Q: With injury problems and a lack of experience along the offensive line, how much of a concern is there that the line will be able to keep Cox healthy?

A: It is certainly a concern, but the best way to keep the rush off Cox is to have an effective running game. I think that's what the mission will be.

Q: With such a tough conference schedule that includes trips to Florida, Arkansas, LSU and Georgia, what is a realistic expectation for the Tigers' record and standing in the SEC?

A: Over the last three years, Auburn is 11-1 in SEC road games. The only loss was in overtime at LSU when John Vaughn missed five field-goal tries in 2005. It wouldn't be reasonable to think Auburn would win all those road games, but I wouldn't expect it to lose them all either. I'm already on record predicting a 9-3 regular-season record and a second-place finish in the West.

Q: No black head coach has ever won at Jordan-Hare Stadium. In fact, only two have ever tried. What do you think the significance of Ron Prince winning at Auburn would be on a local and national level?

A: It had not crossed my mind that no African-American coach had won at Jordan-Hare. I think a win for Kansas State would be very important for Ron Prince and his program, but I don't think the fact that he is an African-American would be of that much significance.

Q: What is the buzz like in the state of Alabama, particularly around Auburn, now that Nick Saban is at Alabama? Is it safe to say he's already hated among Tiger fans?

A: It's safe to say Auburn fans are tired of hearing about Nick Saban. I've been in this business for almost 38 years, and I've never seen anything like the hysteria that has surrounded his arrival at Alabama. I don't think there's much question things are going to get more interesting in this state.

Q: What newcomer is most likely to have an immediate impact, particularly in the game against K-State?

A: Redshirt freshman Mike Berry will start at right guard, true freshman Lee Ziemba at right tackle, redshirt freshman Craig Stevens at outside linebacker and redshirt freshman Zac Etheridge at safety. But probably the most noticeable newcomer will be tailback Mario Fannin.

Q: What is the team's biggest hole or weakness heading into the season?

A: Inexperience on the offensive line.

Q: How much more of an effort has there been by Tommy Tuberville to schedule tougher non-conference opponents since 2004, when his undefeated Auburn team was kept out of the BCS title game because of a weak strength of schedule?

A: You'd be hard-pressed to convince anyone in these parts that a schedule that included five games against teams ranked in the top 15 and four against teams ranked in the top 10 was weak.

Auburn plays two non-conference games against teams from BCS conferences this season in K-State and South Florida and opens next season at West Virginia. To be honest, however, I don't think that has anything to do with 2004. That season was the only one in the BCS era in which three teams from BCS conferences had perfect records. Somebody had to be left out. That's not likely to happen again.

More than it was a weak schedule, it was just bad luck. USC and Oklahoma started out No. 1 and 2 and stayed there.

Small restroom fire causes harm to O'Malleys, cleaner's store

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Investigation is underway after a suspected arson that happened in O'Malley's Alley on Sunday evening.

Firefighters were dispatched to the incident at 8:01 p.m. after a paper towel dispenser in the restroom of O'Malley's was lit on fire by an unknown individual, causing damage to a wall and smoke damage throughout the building.

Witnesses who saw the incident recounted the event.

"I noticed the smoke and people running out of the building," said James Boyd, senior in biology. "Most people were on the streets watching when about five or six fire trucks showed up."

Ideal Cleaners and Tailors, which is next door to O'Malley's, also had smoke damage from the fire, according to Lt. Steve McCallum of the Manhattan Fire Department.

Firefighters responded to the incident promptly, limiting damages to the building, said Nathan Moon, general manager at O'Malley's.

"They rushed into the building with picks and fire hoses," said Jonathan Williamson, freshman in art. "They had the fire extinguished in about five minutes."

No injuries were reported as a result of the fire.

"It looks a lot worse than it actually is," Moon said. "We will be back open on Wednesday."

No suspects have been named at this time.

If you have any information regarding the suspected arson, call the Manhattan Fire Department at (785) 587-4500.

Troupe engages audience

By Adrienne DeWeese

Four chairs, a microphone stand and a piano were the only items on the stage.

Within minutes of the lights going down, though, audience members started laughing. Pianist Matthew Loren Cohen took the stage and played an opening melody of songs, including Van Halen's rock song "Jump."

Chicago City Limits, a six-member comedy troupe, opened the 2007-08 McCain Performance Series on Friday night at McCain Auditorium. About 800 audience members watched the troupe, which is New York's longest-running comedy revue.

Chicago City Limits made audience participation an integral part of its performance. After asking audience members to shout out any word, the cast sang a "Blues Brothers"-style song about zucchini.

The two-hour performance also included a musical titled "Mandy Breaks Up with Howard," which was inspired by an audience member's account of breaking up with her boyfriend.

Thom Jackson, McCain marketing and development officer, said he thought it was interesting how the troupe involved the audience in its performance.

"I think it's very creative," Jackson said. "Overall, I think the audience really enjoyed it, and being part of the show - giving feedback made them a little closer to the performers."

In their final scene of the performance, the actors selected fellow cast member Sharon Fogarty for "Torture an Actor." Fogarty left the auditorium and stayed in McCain's lobby while audience members shouted out phrases that Fogarty would have to guess based on short, improvisational skits.

After rejecting an audience member's proposed line, "That's what she said," cast members chose, "Never get involved in a land war in Asia," a line from the 1987 movie "The Princess Bride," as the line. For about 20 minutes, they acted out scenes for each word in the phrase while Fogarty received applause from audience members when she got close to the correct phrase. Her incorrect guesses included "Don't play war in the kitchen" and "You should never declare war if you can't eat sushi."

Cheryl Lugo, graduate student in marriage and family therapy, said she attended Chicago City Limits' performance because of her love

65 cyclists a part of Critical Mass Manhattan on Friday

After their ride through Aggieville on Moro Avenue, 65 cyclists rode through Manhattan for Critical Mass Manhattan on Friday evening.

Cyclists packed Manhattan Avenue for Critical Mass Manhattan on Friday evening.

Critical Mass is an event where cyclists in communities across the globe get together for a bike ride on the last Friday of every month, said Tyler Whetstone, senior in industrial and manufacturing systems engineering.

Sixty-five cyclists met Friday at 7 p.m. at Mariana Kistler Beach Museum for a bike ride through Manhattan. Critical Mass Manhattan was put together by Whetstone, Tony Savastano, senior in psychology, and Thomas Park, junior in economics.

The cyclists took a route that went through Aggieville and the K-State campus. The ride, which took about a half hour, ended with them returning to the museum.

Whetstone said the group had no conflicts with car drivers during the ride and that they were very safe.

"We stayed together, yielded to cars and gave cars the right of way," Whetstone said.

Park said anyone in the Manhattan community can take part in Critical Mass, and the bike rides they go on are very slow.

Park met one driver during the ride who was interested in bringing her kids to the next bike ride.

"To get that kind of feedback from a driver was really positive," Park said.

While some Critical Mass groups across the world want their bike rides to be used as a way of advocating for alternative transportation, Whetstone

Living Wage Coalition sponsors 6th-annual Labor Fest to raise awareness for minimum wage

By Amanda Keim

The aroma of grilled meats and the sound of live music greeted guests as they entered the City Park Pavilion Sunday afternoon.

The appeal not only was made to the nose and ears of the visitors but also their hearts, as they gathered for the sixth-annual Flint Hills Living Wage Coalition Labor Fest.

The pavilion boomed with applause as several speakers took to the stage, each promoting increased wages and improved working conditions for the Manhattan community.

Each speaker stood opposite an American flag and a larger-than-life peanut accompanied by a sign that read, "Don't let families work for peanuts."

The festival also featured a variety of free foods, including hamburgers, bratwursts and fruits. An acoustic quintet played for the first half hour of the event. The performers played various string and percussion instruments to create a folk-style backdrop prelude the speakers.

The coalition, which organized the festival, works to raise awareness for families living in poverty throughout the community, according to the pamphlet, distributed at the event. The pamphlet said one in 10 households in Manhattan with children under the age of 18 live in poverty. The coalition's goal is to put an end to the vast amount of poverty in the Manhattan area by raising awareness to make a change.

Heidi Zeller, coordinator of Kansas Action Network's "Raise the Wage Campaign," was among one of the first to address the assembly. In her speech, she targeted the arguments often made by those who are against an increase in the Kansas minimum wage and spoke of reforms already taking place in the state.

"We will raise awareness and the wage," Zeller said.

"We are excited to report that we already have petition activities under way in Wichita."

Currently, Kansas is one of only six states with a minimum wage below that of the federal minimum wage. Thirty states are reported to have a minimum wage higher than the federal minimum wage. Research throughout the country shows that an increased minimum wage has proven highly beneficial, Zeller said.

"About 19,000 people in Kansas are not supported by the federal minimum wage but rather by the Kansas

Some of the not-so-hot changes to college football jerseys

BOSTON COLLEGE RIPS OFF PHILADELPHIA EAGLES

Normally the only teams that stoop to the level of stealing logos from professional teams are high schools and junior highs. However, the eagle head on this year's Boston College jerseys is a direct rip-off of the Philadelphia Eagles' logo. It replaced the soaring eagle sleeve logo (right).

SNOOTY KU NEEDS ITS OWN FONT

Since the Jayhawks decided that the same old cookie-cutter font was not quite good enough, they have switched to their school's official Trajan style. However, the annoyingly large numbers are apparently here to stay. One good thing about the new font is it makes their rip-off of the New York Giants' jerseys less noticeable.

PITTSBURGH OPTS TO GO WITH A MORE CLASSIC LOOK

While most changes to jerseys end up being hideous, a few schools actually manage to get it right. Take Pittsburgh for instance. It got rid of all the distracting stripes running up and around the jersey and went with a more traditional style.

OREGON STATE ATTEMPTS TO OUTDO ITS RIVALS

So typically the award for worst jerseys of the year would go to Oregon, but this year it has been replaced by its nemesis to the north, Oregon State. Both schools are prime examples of what can go wrong when you let Nike have too much influence on your school's uniforms.

Group works to improve campus safety after Virginia Tech tragedy

By Brigitte Brechsen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State officials have implemented numerous measures contributing to the security on campus following the Virginia Tech shooting in April.

The Crisis Management Committee at K-State reconvened last spring to discuss possible actions that could prevent a similar incident from occurring at K-State.

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said the committee worked to improve the Reverse 9-1-1 system installed in 2005 that would notify everyone on campus in the event of an emergency. The system, which is a joint effort between K-State Telecommunications and the campus police, dials hundreds of office and residence hall front desk phones in a 10-minute period in response to an emergency; this helps to spread word or instructions around campus.

One of the efforts being made to help improve the system are training faculty how to effectively respond under crises, Bosco said.

"We briefed academic deans last week regarding appropriate measures to take," he said.

The Virginia Tech massacre resulted from a lack of communication, according to a report released Thursday by a panel reviewing the shooting. The report acknowledges the two-hour period that college officials failed to warn the campus that a shooter was on the loose, according to an Associated Press report.

Prior to the Reverse 9-1-1 system at K-State, there was a gap in making sure students and faculty on campus could be notified, said Heather Reed, assistant dean of student life.

"We had to think of a way to quickly reach everyone on campus," Reed said.

This gap led the committee at K-State to look at various companies with text-messaging programs that can notify people campus wide in the event of a disaster. The committee should have a report back in a couple weeks that tells them where they are in the process and which company provides the best text-messaging program, Reed said.

Another entity that contributes to the safety of everyone on campus is the KSU police department.

"K-State is very lucky in that we have our very own police department," Reed said.

K-State police have undergone Active Shooter Training since the Columbine incident, in which two gunmen killed 13 people and injured 24 on April 20, 1999.

KSU Police Capt. Richard Herrman outlined the basics the training provides officers.

"The first few officers arriving on the scene will advance forward and isolate the area to its smallest possible containment and deal with the shooter in any manner necessary to prevent innocent people from being killed," Herrman said.

Also beneficial is the collaboration between the campus police and the Riley County Police Department, Reed said.

"In the event of an emergency, they have a seamless process to get everyone to a location where they might be needed," Reed said.

The residence halls also have recently updated their security measures to ensure the safety of residents.

Derek Jackson, assistant director of Housing and Dining, said the services committee had worked to increase security measures even before the Virginia Tech shootings.

"We have instituted a door assistant position to serve as a point of entry after 9 p.m., as well as require residents to sign in all guests regardless of time," Jackson said.

Residence assistants are required to get to know students and have to answer specific questions about the background, academic status and well being of every resident under their jurisdiction, Jackson said.

The committee also developed an online guide to educate the K-State community about information pertaining to crisis situations.

"On www.ksu.edu/studentlife, under Crisis Assistance, we have upgraded the Web site with a number of helpful sites for security issues pertaining to students and faculty, as well as making information available for parents," Reed said.

Coach Prince to co-instruct leadership course for 2nd year in a row

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State students and business professionals across the country have the opportunity to learn about leadership skills from coach Ron Prince.

For the second year, Prince will co-instruct Current Topics in Leadership with Susan Scott, assistant vice president of Leadership Studies and Programs; and Todd Wells, assistant director for educational leadership.

The class is offered this year in three formats - one-credit-hour traditional classroom setting, one-credit-hour online course and non-credit online course.

Students must have a sophomore academic standing prior to taking the course, Wells said.

The traditional classroom format will be from 11:45 a.m. to 1 p.m. Fridays before home football games in Dole Hall.

The classroom format only is available for Leadership Studies and Programs minors, and five spots are still open in the class, Wells said.

The lecture is a dialogue between Prince and Scott about the textbook and their personal experiences as they relate to leadership, Wells said. The class is taped from noon to 1 p.m., and the taped lectures are formatted for the online courses.

The course also is offered as a one-credit-hour course through K-State Online for students who are not Leadership Studies and Programs minors, Wells said.

About 35 people took the online class last year, which ranged from K-State students to company managers, Wells said.

This also is the first year for the non-credit online course, which allows participants access to lectures and discussions without completing assignments for academic credit.

The course is available for students, business professionals, high-school and college teachers and K-State sports fans, Wells said.

"The reason to offer it was because if all students want to do is watch the lecture between Susan Scott and coach Prince, they can watch it and absorb it for what it is," Wells said.

"Good to Great," a management book by Jim Collins, is used as a textbook for the course.

Wells said the book tells students how to take good results and turn them into great results through their leadership capabilities.

"It's business based, but I think it can really be articulated and used in any organization," Wells said.

The course provides students the chance to look more in-depth at the book.

"It is an opportunity to learn the concepts in 'Good to Great,' and it also provides practical application that Coach Prince and I try to bring home to the students in their day-to-day lives and leadership experiences," Scott said. "Learning the content and developing that person as a leader is a unique experience."

As a co instructor, Scott said Prince is exceptionally bright and articulate in an academic setting.

"I've co-taught many times," Scott said. "I've enjoyed my co instructors, but he's really an elite by himself."

Wells also said Prince is smart and translates his life experiences into the classroom.

"It's not every day you get the opportunity to learn from a Division-I football coach," Wells said.

"Although it's being taped, which might put some students on edge, it makes it unique in that it's not something you'll get to experience everyday at K-State."

Ron Prince listens to Susan Scott, director of leadership studies program, Oct. 6, 2006, at Bob Dole Hall during the leadership studies class.

Nick Piper, senior in financial management and international business, said he took the course last year to see how Prince's and Scott's leadership skills compared.

Piper said he recommends the course for students to add more to their leadership styles.

"I learned that as a leader and as an individual, you can achieve anything you want to if you apply the right keys of success," Piper said. "Coach Prince and Susan Scott both had humble beginnings, so the basic lesson is continue to better yourself as a person each day, and then there is no boundary to what you can achieve."

'All by myself ...'

Picking cabinet members based on loyalty not beneficial for Bush

Imagining George Bush sitting alone in his office with all of his closest friends gone is something many of us always wanted. Now that it has actually happened, I almost feel some sympathy for the guy.

During the past year, many of his top advisers have left, including Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, Campaign Adviser Karl Rove and a bevy of other friends and cabinet members.

This rash of departures has caused some serious stress for the administration, especially because Bush's main theme with his cabinet was loyalty; he chose close friends and people he could trust. It turns out these people probably were not only far from the most qualified but also not the most loyal. This can be called a lose-lose situation.

Bush took pride in his cabinet, and he trusted them with some of the biggest and most influential decisions.

According to the book, "The Price of Loyalty," based off numerous interviews and documents from former Bush Secretary of Treasury Paul O'Neill, Bush and his circle of friends within his cabinet hardly debated and never had a structured policy on several issues.

Bush had several yes-men in Washington and many from Texas who never questioned his policies.

Now, most of these friends are gone. One after another, members of Bush's cabinet left, including Secretary of State Colin Powell, Attorney General John Ashcroft, Rumsfeld, three different press secretaries, many Texas buddies — including one of his closest friends Alberto Gonzales — and maybe the most devastating loss, his adviser, Karl Rove. All of these men were brought in to establish a feeling of loyalty, with no questions asked.

Rove was one of the main proponents and instigators of Bush's concept of loyalty. According to a Washington Post article from Aug. 19, Rove spent six years in the administration trying to spread Bush's conservative agenda through all levels of bureaucracy and government. The way to do this was through people who were loyal to the proliferation of those ideas.

According to the article, Rove's master plan failed. Because of the many mistakes of Bush and his cabinets, people did not accept the agenda. Rove had lost one of his biggest battles, so he quit and fled back to his home.

Some of Bush's most influential cabinet members and friends have left over the past six-and-a-half years, leaving Bush all alone with more than a year left in office. He no longer has the power or the loyalty he sought in the beginning. Who would have thought loyalty was such a bad idea to build a cabinet around?

Aubrey Immanuel, a former political psychologist at the College of St. Benedict and St. John's University, previewed the downfall of an administration built around trust in a column she wrote for the St. Cloud Times in Minnesota on Dec. 21, 2000.

She said a cabinet of close confidants would not breed a healthy, thought — provoking administration, especially for a president like Bush who trusts his advisers to know what they are talking about. She continued by stating that building a cabinet around loyalty, not competence, was not the best decision.

She was right.

Now Bush is alone at the top. All of his friends are gone, and his agendas have failed, with few people to turn to. Many of his friends turned out to be failures, and worse yet, Bush failed to properly remove them. Because of this loyalty, Bush just prolonged his ineffective administration.

The people in charge of the country should be the best at what they do, not the best friends. Friends are great, but they might not be the best people to determine U.S. policy.

Groups should be able to handle jokes in order to integrate

Cartoons have long played a vital role in political discourse by antagonizing not just one particular group of people but everybody. Recently however, the media has filtered out what they deem might be controversial to Muslim fundamentalists.

The underlying problem in this situation is we have become a nation that trembles at the thought of portraying anything alluding to Islam, Allah, Muslims, Muhammed or the Quran in a negative light — especially a satirical one.

The "Opus" cartoon, set to run on Aug. 26 and Sept. 2, featured Lola Grana, who for the strip asks to be called Fatima Struggle. Wearing a burka, she tries to get her boyfriend, Steve, to accept her latest craze, radical Islam.

On Aug. 28, Fox News reported The Washington Post Writers Group, who syndicates "Opus," sent out an alert on the two strips when Muslim staffers of the Post responded emotionally to the cartoon.

As a result, the cartoon was pulled from many newspapers.

Since Sept. 11, U.S. citizens have been walking a fine line when addressing anything having to do with the Islamic faith or its followers. Those who have criticized or confronted Islamic fanatics are either verbally accosted with insults, physically threatened or even murdered, as was the case with Dutch filmmaker Theo Van Gogh — murdered after making a controversial movie about Islamic culture.

This irrational fear was aided by the ACLU's report over the U.S. government's handling of Sept. 11.

The report called "Sanction Bias: Racial Profiling Since 9/11" stated, "The trauma of 9/11 has made anti-immigrant sentiment acceptable ... the nation's Arab, Muslim and South Asian populations are most affected."

The ACLU statements hindered more than helped Muslims because they promoted the idea that everyone of the Islamic faith was a victim of cruel behavior.

This idea of victimization leads to further isolation and estrangement. Mark Steyn, author of "America Alone," commented Aug. 29 on the talk show "Hannity and Colmes," saying, "If you can't have jokes about everybody in society and if one group is hedged off and protected then that group will never truly be integrated."

Furthermore, efforts to protect

Muslims from satire similar to that of comics are futile as long as media watchdogs are the only people attempting to sanction appeasement.

Fox News reported on Aug. 28 that Amy Lago, Writers Group comic editor "did alert newspapers about the Muslim-themed cartoon because there was question about whether Muslim readers would be offended."

This small, simple statement packs a big punch. Why would we need to fret over whether Muslim readers would be offended when no one stops to even think twice when there is a gag about Christianity, Judaism or Scientology?

The controversy surrounding the cartoonist in Denmark, who published various depictions of Muhammad and was forced into hiding because of the outrage it caused, is an example of how radical Muslims will react to something they find to be insulting.

On Dec. 12, 2005, Jyllands-Posten, the newspaper that originally published the cartoons, called the cartoons "a test of whether fear of Islamic retribution has begun to limit the freedom of expression in Denmark."

If we are to assume a Muslim would be offended when a satirical item is published regarding their religion, than possibly there is a reason to fear their taking offense.

The United States must recognize for itself, as did Denmark, how much we are limiting ourselves when we have to remove a comic strip from a newspaper to appease Muslims.

We must not live in perpetual fear of whether we are going to offend someone, no matter what religion. We cannot function efficiently as a country when we allow ourselves to be inconsistent with our standards by favoring, or coddling certain groups over others.

Column about global warming misses its mark

Editor,

What disbelievers of global warming seem to miss is individual events, such as glaciers melting or gaining balance, are the symptoms, not the disease.

The amount and types of land cover on the earth, the levels of greenhouse gases in the atmosphere and an increase in global temperatures all fit into a much larger process. It is the operation of and changes to the system as a whole we should be concerned with, not the fact that Denver is experiencing a record snowstorm.

To state that a specific weather event like an afternoon tornado can be blamed on global warming is wrong. It is also wrong to say the recent hot weather we have experienced is due solely to globally increasing temperature.

Meteorology is the study of short-term weather phenomena while climatology is the study of long-term patterns. A single event cannot be tied directly to global climate change (a long-term phenomena), but conversely, a single instance of glacial balance increasing does not disprove the hypothesis either.

Chuck Armstrong chose a few individual events that allowed him to state, "Hey, global warming is not occurring. Look at the South Pole, and weren't the scientists wrong before?"

What he has failed to do is realize climate scientists do not look at individual events to explain long-term trends.

Armstrong, in the future, you might do well to reserve your opinions for American Idol speculations and leave scientific writing to those who study science.

Mitchel Stimers
PH.D. STUDENT IN GEOGRAPHY

Editor,

Chuck Armstrong is the latest in a long line of Collegian columnists who have used the same tired arguments to deny global warming.

Armstrong is correct to say the Earth is cooling in places, but he fails to understand "warming" refers to global average temperatures.

Regional cooling is a well-understood and predictable consequence of increases in greenhouse gases. It does not refute warming predictions.

Armstrong is correct to say some glaciers are expanding, but most are not. More importantly, the polar glaciers and ice caps are shrinking. How can this be explained, other than by an increase in global mean temperature?

True, the mean global temperature has "only" increased by 0.6 degrees, but it took less than 100 years for this to happen.

For perspective, the global average temperature around 15,000 years ago, when much of the earth's surface was covered with ice, was "only" about 3 degrees less than it is now.

At current rates of increasing, temperatures could be 2 degrees warmer within this century. Small numbers, big consequences.

Finally, Armstrong is also correct that there was a "global cooling" controversy in the 1970s. However, it was more a creation of journalists than scientists. The majority of climate scientists believed then, as now, temperatures would increase, driven by human activity.

It's been about 14 years since I first responded to a Collegian column on global warming. In that time, the denial community has offered no new evidence backing its beliefs.

Dr. Doug Goodin
DEPARTMENT OF GEOGRAPHY

Editor,

People need to remember one thing when talking about global warming: climate is not the same as day-to-day weather. Fractions of degrees do not mean every place on the planet is suddenly going to have record highs every day.

A lot more goes into day-to-day weather; in fact, global warming could actually make some regions colder due to its effects on warm water currents.

The fact remains that global average temperatures have risen. The planet is, as a whole, warmer. It doesn't matter what you think might be the cause.

The recorded increase in global average temperature means the planet as a whole has warmed. You can go ahead and deny that if you want, but you'll be wrong. The data is not lying.

I know you desperately want Al Gore and the rest of the alarmists to be wrong so you can gloat at your political enemies, but don't let it cloud your judgment. Hotter temperatures could pose a significant risk to humanity's future.

Editor,

Well the jig is up. The hard-pressing journalistic duo of Chuck Armstrong and Brett King finally has exposed us self-righteous environmentalists.

It's true, we Commie hippies want to run your life, and we might try to eat your children, too. If you let someone like Al Gore into the White House, it could mean the end of civilized culture as you know it.

Just think: more bike lanes, less entanglement in the Middle East, cleaner rivers, less asthma for children, a green economic sector that would provide millions of jobs that can't be outsourced, Florida, and a renewed American reputation internationally.

So next time you see one of us long-hairs biking in front of you with our hemp shoes and organic clothes on, make sure you protect your way of life and hit the gas.

Editor,

Opinions presented in Chuck Armstrong's article are vague and founded on information from inappropriate sources. Though a natural climate cycle has existed on Earth for millions of years, human influences have exaggerated this cycle.

It is true temperatures are not increasing uniformly worldwide; many scientists refer to this as global climate change, not warming.

"Temperatures and climate patterns are more extreme, resulting in widespread change in precipitation and wind patterns, ocean salinity and temperature, arctic temperatures and ice mass" (Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, 2007).

Armstrong does address mistakes made by "eco-freaks" in rushing to find evidence for global warming in everyday life. It is easy to curse the heat wave, drought or flooding as a consequence of climate change.

These events observed alone offer little proof; they are isolated data in a continuous stream of evidence. However, credible science demonstrates that human behavior alters the environment.

It is not the validity of the link between global warming and human activity that is important; it is the responsibility we have to maintain the global ecosystem on which we depend. Denying this responsibility is counterproductive.

Instead of attacking one another, we should utilize strengths in the arguments set forth by the "other side" to critically evaluate and refine our own positions.

Through individual contributions and responsible behaviors like recycling, purchasing energy-efficient appliances and vehicles, and lending our support to environmentally responsible legislation, we can be part of a quiet green revolution.

Collegian columnist should focus on bigger issues

Editor,

As I was reading Brett King's Aug. 31 column on the terrifying specter of roving gangs of bicycling anarchists, I thought, "Isn't this fight a little unfair?"

After reading his petty bashing of hippie cyclists, I was disappointed King didn't write on something different. With so many challenging topics for our resident cranky conservative, I thought King picked the easy out.

Why not explain why the taxpayers should continue to pay $200 million a day for the war in Iraq when only five of the 18 benchmarks have been met, according to the Government Accountability Office?

Perhaps King would care to explain why support for torture has become a prerequisite for any serious Republican presidential candidate.

His flowery prose and clever quips are wasted on hippie cyclist anarchist tree-huggers and are better served explaining why his movement has chosen to make a mockery of our Constitution, execute the war in Iraq with incomprehensible ignorance, demonize and isolate homosexuals and placed political patronage over competence at every – and I mean every – turn.

These more pressing and less comfortable questions could be tackled by the talented King, but I fear they won't be.

Tire article required more investigation

Editor,

I was very displeased with the "Flat Out" article published on The Edge in Tuesday's edition of the Collegian.

If the paper is going to publish an article telling thousands of students how to change a flat tire, you should be more thorough in the descriptions of the steps and editing of the article.

Some of the terms used should have been described because I'm sure not everyone is equally knowledgeable about parts of the car or terms used when changing a flat tire.

The four steps laid out, along with their descriptions were not very clear and even partially incorrect.

Steps two and three were written out of order and other important steps were skipped altogether.

I would never recommend this article to anyone as a guide to changing a flat tire.

Those who don't already know how to change a flat tire would be better off calling someone or using AAA rather than relying on the information provided in this article.

I hope you will do more careful editing and investigating before publishing something like this again.

FOOTBALL | AUBURN 23, K-STATE 13

TURNING POINT

Brandon Cox's touchdown pass to Gabe McKenzie with 2:01 remaining in the fourth quarter Auburn's lone offensive touchdown gave the Tigers a 16-13 lead and awakened the 80,000-plus Auburn fans at Jordan-Hare Stadium. Josh Freeman fumbled on K-State's next series, ending any comeback hopes.

QUOTE OF THE GAME

Coach Ron Prince | "You don't come into a place like this and expect them to give you the game. We had a nice game going for a while, but that's the difference. You go on the road, it's like a heavyweight fight. You've got to knock the champ out. You can't try to get a win on decision."

MAGIC NUMBER

57 | That's the number of pass attempts for Josh Freeman, just four shy of the school record. It's also the number of yards the Tigers covered on their game-winning touchdown drive. Auburn's go-ahead touchdown came, oddly enough, 57 minutes and 59 seconds into the game.

MVP

Jordy Nelson | The senior wide receiver grabbed nine receptions for 90 yards and threw K-State's only touchdown pass, a 21-yard completion to Leon Patton in the third quarter.

SLIPPING AWAY

Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN

ABOVE: Auburn wide receiver John Cubelic is tackled by senior defensive back Byron Garvin and junior linebacker Reggie Walker during the second half of Saturday's game at Auburn. K-State lost 23-13 after leading for much the game.
BELOW: Sophomore quarterback Josh Freeman buries his face in the grass in frustration after an incomplete pass during the fourth quarter Saturday at Auburn. Freeman completed 32 of 57 passes for 268 yards but fumbled on a crucial series with K-State trailing late in the game.

Wildcats will learn from trip

AUBURN, Ala. — In years past, it didn't take a palm reader or a magic eight-ball to predict the outcome of K-State's season opener.

The opponent was usually some combination of a cardinal direction (Eastern, Western, Northern) and a state (Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky). It was like football and mad libs rolled into one.

But for the first time since the Nixon administration, the Wildcats opened the season against a ranked opponent. And they did it in front of more than 80,000 football-starved Southerners at Auburn's Jordan-Hare Stadium.

College football's opening weekend usually features more cupcakes than a kindergarten birthday party. Most teams would rather ease into the season and save the make-or-break games for October and November.

But that's not the way Ron Prince thinks. He saw this game as an opportunity, a chance for K-State to make inroads into living rooms across the nation.

Of course, it was also a risk. If things got messy, that national audience would be flipping to "Star Trek" reruns by halftime.

By now, you probably know how the game turned out. K-State outplayed Auburn for nearly 57 minutes. The defense swarmed and smothered Auburn's offense, holding the Tigers out of the end zone until late in the fourth quarter. Freeman was cool and poised and one or two big plays away from spectacular.

But sometime in the fourth quarter, there was a subtle shift that put the momentum decidedly and irreversibly in Auburn's favor. It happened before Quentin Groves bulldozed Freeman and forced a back-breaking fumble, even before Auburn quarterback Brandon Cox found backup tight end Gabe McKenzie open in the corner of the end zone to give Auburn the lead for good.

So what do we make of this game? You can't call it a failure, not after K-State stood toe-to-toe with Auburn and all its tradition. You've got to think potential recruits who tuned into ESPN saw a young, exciting, up-and-coming team that will be winning plenty of these games in the future.

But you can't call it a success, either. After the game, no one in the K-State locker room was talking about victories, moral or otherwise. Linebacker Reggie Walker eloquently summed up the feelings of everyone in the room, saying, "We blew it. We blew the lead. We had them, and we blew it." Now you and I and Ron Prince and Josh Freeman and Weird Robert and everyone else associated with K-State football are asking ourselves the same question.

Was it worth it? Was the experience worth the price? Did Prince do the right thing by throwing his team in the fire on week one? Is a hard-fought loss better than an easy win? The next time the Wildcats play on the big stage, will they be a little tougher, a little smarter, a little better in the clutch?

There's no way to say for sure. But to quote my magic eight-ball, "all signs point to yes."

K-State loses lead in 4th quarter of catfight at Auburn

By Jeffrey Rake
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

AUBURN, Ala. — It couldn't have been going any better for K-State in its season opener against No. 18 Auburn.

The Wildcats overcame a slow start by mixing in timely trick plays and an efficient second-half offense that — for a while, anyway — had the 86,439 fans at Jordan-Hare Stadium silenced.

Then it all came apart. Auburn quarterback Brandon Cox connected with tight end Gabe McKenzie on a 3-yard touchdown pass in the left corner of the end zone, giving the Tigers a three-point lead with 2:01 remaining.

On the ensuing possession, with comeback hopes still alive, K-State fumbled away its chances.

Auburn's Quentin Groves tackled K-State's Josh Freeman from behind, dislodging the football from the quarterback's hands. Antonio Coleman scooped it up, tucked it away and raced 34 yards into the end zone, sending the Tigers — who trailed the majority of the second half — to a 23-13 win over K-State.

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

"You don't come into a place like this and expect them to give you the game," K-State coach Ron Prince said. "We had a nice game going for a while, but that's the difference. You go on the road, it's like a heavyweight fight. You've got to knock the champ out. You can't try to get a win on decision."

K-State had built a four-point lead when Auburn took over possession at its own 43-yard line with 4:26 remaining. The Tigers moved 54 yards in five plays, setting up a 1st-and-goal from the three.

But the Wildcats, who acknowledged afterward they had an idea of what was coming, lost track of McKenzie and left him open in the end zone for the touchdown.

"We had watched this play on film because Auburn used it against Florida last season," said K-State linebacker Reggie Walker. "We thought the fullback was the main option so that is why we left Gabe open."

The Auburn offense couldn't get anything going until that point. K-State's defense held Cox to 126 yards passing on only seven completions and forced him into a pair of interceptions through three quarters. But Cox came through when his team most needed it, and the Wildcats couldn't get the Tigers off the field.

Cox went 5-of-6 on the drive that set up the game-winning play, and totaled 103 yards in the fourth quarter alone.

"We have to learn how to finish," said Jordy Nelson, who had nine receptions for 90 yards. "Auburn is a team that does not quit."

Added Walker: "It's disappointing. We just blew it."

Linebackers play important role on defense

By Ryne Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

AUBURN, Ala. — Speed and versatility are two things coach Ron Prince wants from his players. Judging from Saturday's performance, K-State's linebackers have both.

Against Auburn, K-State's linebackers had a total of 27 tackles, 2.5 sacks and one interception.

In all, K-State recorded five sacks and sent Auburn's Brandon Cox to the turf an additional eight times.

"It was definitely the play calling and just being relentless," junior Reggie Walker said. "The whole defense came in knowing we wanted to put pressure on Cox and we wanted to hit him."

Leading the linebackers was Walker with six tackles, a sack for minus-eight yards and an interception late in the second quarter.

Junior Antwon Moore also caused havoc coming off the edge against the young Auburn offensive line.

"I said all of camp that Antwon Moore was going to be a big contributor for us," junior Ian Campbell said. "He is very quick. He is half safety, half linebacker."

The only play that Moore did not finish came late in the second quarter with Auburn on its 2-yard line. Moore came off the edge and nearly tackled Cox for a safety, but he missed the tackle and Auburn escaped with a pass interference penalty on the play. Later on in the drive, Moore had a sack to force a long third down play.

Some players, like Campbell and senior Rob Jackson, played with their hand down as defensive linemen and standing as linebackers. Players were rotating in out of the game on a regular basis.

The starting linebackers were Campbell on the outside with sophomore Eric Childs on the other side, while Walker and senior Justin Roland occupied the middle spots. K-State rotated nine linebackers into the game.

"The mix we bring with the different packages we have of linebackers really gives the other teams fits," Campbell said. "Everybody has a different thing that they bring to the plate."

Jackson, who finished the game with a career-high two sacks, played linebacker for the first time in his K-State career.

"I get to attack the offense from different angles," Jackson said. "[I] get to show a little bit of my versatility."

The linebackers were part of a unit that kept a Southeastern Conference team to 291 yards, only 62 of which came on the ground. K-State ended up with 10 tackles-for-loss for a total of 38 yards.

"They were good," Auburn running back Ben Tate said. "They fought us hard. There are some great athletes on that team."

Squad falls to 2 ranked teams, beats Louisville in Hawaii classic

By Jonathan Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The No. 25 Wildcats lost to a pair of ranked opponents at last weekend's Hawaiian Airlines Wahine Classic, falling to No. 5 UCLA and No. 16 Hawaii.

K-State's only win of the tournament came against unranked Louisville.

K-State struggled in its first match of the tournament against Hawaii, losing in four games (34-32, 30-26, 25-30, 31-29). Juniors Nataly Korobkova and Rita Liliom led the Wildcats in kills against Hawaii, recording 24 and 20, respectively.

After losing for the first time this season, the Wildcats rebounded with a 3-0 (30-27, 30-23, 30-16) victory over Louisville. The Wildcats tallied 59 kills on 100 attacks for a .480 hitting percentage, the fifth-best hitting percentage in K-State history.

The Wildcats' final match of the tournament featured No. 5 UCLA, K-State's highest-ranked opponent so far this season. UCLA overpowered K-State, beating the squad in four games (30-20, 30-25, 19-30, 30-27). Senior Angie Last-ara led the Wildcats with 21 digs, her school-record 22nd career match with 20 or more digs.

Though K-State lost two of its three matches, coach Suzie Fritz said the Hawaii tournament provided a useful measuring stick as the Wildcats prepare for conference play.

"We wanted an opportunity to play and get some competitive matches under our belt and get a real test to see where we line up," Fritz said. "There is no better practice than going up and seeing where we are at."

Jenny Jantsch jumps up for a spike during a 3-0 win over Houston on Tuesday.

Next up for the Wildcats is the Varney's Invitational, which begins Friday in Manhattan. K-State opens Big 12 Conference play Sept. 12 at Kansas.

CROSS COUNTRY

Men, women take 2nd at J.K. Gold Classic

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The men's and women's cross country teams started the year strong, finishing second in the 4-kilometer JK Gold Classic Sept. 1 in Wichita.

The host team, Wichita State, came in first in both divisions. K-State placed second, despite missing its top three women's runners and two members of the men's squad. Liliani Mendez, Morgan Bonds and Emily Dittmore were sidelined until Friday's race, and both men's team captain Colin Swaney and freshman Mike Sickafoose were unable to compete due to minor injuries. Sickafoose is expected to run Friday, but coach Michael Smith said Swaney might be out until October.

As a team, the men finished three points behind

Wichita State. The women's team finished 16 points behind Wichita State.

"I would highlight the fact that with a largely developmental group of young athletes, we were competitive with Wichita State," Smith said. "We only ran half of our team and we were competitive, largely with underclassmen."

For the men, junior Alex Umberger finished third individually behind two competitors from Cloud County Community College. Finishing in fifth for the K-State men was junior Danny Schneider.

"Alex Umberger led us and he did pretty well," Smith said. "For Danny Schneider, his race was a breakthrough performance because he was able to run quite a bit better. I think he'll continue to be consistent at that level. It'll be a surprise because we didn't expect it this early."

In the women's division, freshmen Sydney Messick and Anaïs Galan and senior Liz Rea finished in fourth, fifth and sixth places, respectively.

"I felt a few of the women could get more out of training and not racing," Smith said. "We have a couple of people that aren't ready to race yet, but our top two runners are training really well and we'll introduce them this weekend."

K-State will face off in a dual Friday against Kansas in its only home meet of the year. The meet will be at Warner Park with the women beginning at 6:45 p.m. and the men at 7:15 p.m.

"My expectations are that we are competitive and that we run to my level of expectation," Smith said. "As we go along, we get more competitive. Our schedule is designed that way."

WORLD NEWS

1ST WOMAN BECOMES POST GUARD AT TOWER OF LONDON

LONDON — The first woman to join the ranks of the Beefeaters in more than 500 years has mastered the Ceremony of the Keys, the nightly locking-up ritual of the Tower of London guards.

But she said she still is learning the history of the site to prepare for guiding more than two million visitors every year.

Dressed in a knee-length dark blue coat with red trim and matching top hat, Moira Cameron on Monday became the first female Beefeater, or Yeoman Warder, since the corps of Tower guards was founded in 1485. She told The Associated Press the medieval castle is a wonderful place to work.

"You do the job for prestige, and because you meet people every day," she said.

She said she relishes contact with visitors after 22 years of desk work as an army accountant.

"It's wonderful to meet these people because they so want to be here and are interested in anything you can tell them," she said.

"And you can have a really good laugh with them as well."

The Tower, arguably Britain's most famous historical site, was founded by King William I shortly after he conquered England in 1066.

Henry III started his coronation procession from the site in 1236, a royal tradition that persisted into the 17th century.

The Tower of London is also home to Britain's Crown Jewels, including St. Edward's Crown, worn by Queen Elizabeth II during her 1953 coronation.

Cameron, 42, started dreaming of a job in the Tower after six years in the army. But back then, she doubted whether she would last the minimum of 22 years' service required to apply.

The attraction is the "depth of history" in the place, she said.

While there was never any formal ban on female Beefeaters, Britain's Ministry of Defense said it was only recently that women, who can now count maternity leave as part of their service in the forces, were notching up as many years as men.

BUSH'S SECRET TRIP TO IRAQ WAS 5-6 WEEKS IN THE PLANNING

AL-ASAD AIR BASE, Iraq — President Bush slipped out a side door at the White House and ducked into a waiting car. No motorcade or helicopter this time that would attract unwanted attention.

His schedule said Bush was spending Sunday evening in Washington before traveling the next morning to Australia. Instead, Air Force One lifted off from Andrews Air Force Base after dark Sunday night on a secret flight to Iraq.

Only one other car accompanied Bush to Andrews — not the usual contingent of security, communications, staff and VIP vehicles and media vans.

The trip was conceived five or six weeks ago as White House officials deliberated strategy for dealing with a Democratic-led Congress trying to force Bush to begin troop withdrawals. Next week will be pivotal because Bush has to give lawmakers his assessment of the progress of the war since he announced the buildup of some 30,000 troops in January.

For security reasons, the president's trip — his third to Iraq — was a closely guarded secret. But there had been speculation he might go to Iraq on the way to Australia. Suspicions were raised because Bush was getting to Sydney three nights before the opening of the Asia-Pacific summit, the main reason for the trip. Then, first lady Laura Bush said she would not make the trip because of a heretofore unmentioned pinched nerve.

White House officials pleaded ignorance about any trip but on Saturday began reaching out to the 10 or so members of the press who would accompany Bush on his plane. Reporters were summoned for face-to-face meetings with Dana Perino, the incoming press secretary, or National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe.

Members of the media were asked to tell only one editor at their news organizations. They also were allowed to tell their spouse. Officials warned the trip would be called off if the secret got out.

CALL GIRLS DROP CHARGES AGAINST GADHAFI'S NEPHEW

LONDON — Two call girls have dropped assault charges against the nephew of Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi, Britain's Crown Prosecution Service said Monday.

The two women had alleged that they were beaten up by Mohammed al-Sanussi, 26, at his London home on Nov. 17. The women said in court documents the attack occurred after they tried to leave when a dispute over money erupted. Sanussi was arrested after police went to the house.

One of the women, Karen Etcheberry, claimed she was followed shortly after going to police.

"I withdrew from the case because I was scared," she told the Sunday Times and Daily Mail newspapers.

The case began three weeks ago in London's Blackfriars court but the judge issued a gag order that shielded al-Sanussi's nationality and all but silenced any coverage of the case. Telephone calls to Judge David Martineau on the reason behind the gag order were not immediately returned Monday.

Al-Sanussi's father, Abdullah, is the head of Libya's intelligence service and Gadhafi's brother-in-law.

The Libyan government asked the Foreign Office to pass on their "concerns" to prosecutors, according to a British government official who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the case. Libyan officials also allegedly raised the matter during former British Prime Minister Tony Blair's trip to Tripoli when a major gas deal was announced.

"The Libyans raised the case with the Foreign Office and wanted us to pass their concerns to director of public prosecutions," the British government official told The Associated Press, refusing to discuss the contents of the letter sent in July. "It was routine."

The official said the British government would not have interfered in the case.

A spokesman for the Libyan government in London declined to comment.

Students prepare for Vet Med school applications in variety of ways

By Hannah Blick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Oct. 1 is the deadline for students who are applying to the College of Veterinary Medicine to submit their applications.

FIRST-TIME APPLICATIONS

Jackie Hand, senior in animal science and industry, is applying for the first time this fall. Hand said she has worked on her application since the end of July and plans to turn it in several weeks prior to the deadline.

The online application only is accessible to students with a specified account and consists of more than 20 different sections, Hand said. The application begins by asking for basic, personal information and moving on to essay questions about the student's experience with animals, classes they have taken and why they are applying to the college, Hand said.

Another requirement of the application is three electronic evaluations. The evaluations are recommendations promoting students and their applications to the college. One evaluation must be from a veterinarian, one from a student adviser or professor, and the last from a professional in the field, Hand said.

The application also asks students to list prior experience in the area of veterinary medicine, Hand said.

"Most students volunteer at a vet clinic or zoo," Hand said. "But a lot of them don't get internships until they're accepted into the college."

Hand said she worked for a professor, assisting with research and gaining an inside look at the world of veterinary medicine, she said.

Along with work experience, students are asked to list any extracurricular activities in which they have been involved throughout high school and college pertaining to veterinary medicine.

PRE-VET MED CLUB

Jennifer Bormann, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry, said there are many opportunities for K-State students to build their résumé before they apply to the College of Veterinary Medicine.

Bormann, also the adviser for the Pre-Veterinary Medicine Club, said students who plan to apply to the College of Veterinary Medicine can benefit from joining the club.

The club provides two main services for students. First, it gives them activities to add to their list of involvement. The club participates in a variety of activities like community service and fundraising. For example, students can volunteer at Sunset Zoological Park in Manhattan or help with "dog-and-jog," the College of Veterinary Medicine's fundraiser benefiting service dogs for disabled people.

Second, the club gives its members a chance to learn about other options available in their departments besides veterinary medicine, such as research veterinarians.

"The club helps open (students') eyes to other opportunities," Bormann said. "They need to understand the entirety of their field, beyond just medicine."

The club has about 100 members this year, ranging from freshmen to seniors, and has biweekly meetings, Bormann said. The club invites guest speakers from within the profession to come and share advice and stories with the members, Bormann said.

"(The club) is also a great networking tool," Bormann said. "Students can meet other students with their same interests, and they can help each other out before and after being accepted into the college."

PRE-VET MED ADVISING

While students offer each other support during the tedious application process, advisers give students academic guidance and advice.

Dave Nichols, professor in animal sciences and industry and pre-veterinary medicine student adviser, said the veterinary medicine profession is popular for several reasons.

"It is a very competitive field that has been highly regarded for a long time," Nichols said. "It also has a very rigorous curriculum."

Nichols said about half of the students he advises are pre-veterinary medicine students.

The advisers work closely with the College of Veterinary Medicine to follow the college's curriculum. They attend pre-veterinary medicine advisers' meetings and make sure they are guiding students toward the right goal, Nichols said.

"Our goal is to help students get where they want to go," Nichols said. "We also like to point out other options for students, like biotechnology or bioscience."

Nichols said that it is difficult to predict whose application will be accepted and who will have to try again. The qualifications are grade-driven, but there are other standards, Nichols said. A passion and understanding for the field of veterinary medicine, as with any profession, is key, Nichols said. He also said communication and people skills are important.

The College of Veterinary Medicine attracts people from all walks of life, creating a diverse environment, Nichols said.

"A great part of my job is getting to work with many different students," Nichols said. "They are very driven and passionate about their goals."

Throughout the process of applying to the college, Nichols, along with other advisers, works closely with students. Advisers and students often form friendly relationships, making it difficult to part when the student moves on to their four years in the College of Veterinary Medicine, Nichols said.

"It is hard to work so closely with a student, only to have them leave for vet school and then never see them again," Nichols said. "But I'm proud of all of them, and I know many of them will go on to be very successful veterinarians."

This is a common goal for all students applying to the College of Veterinary Medicine, and students can get an idea of how deep their desire is just by going through the application process, said Tracey Mendlen, second-year in veterinary medicine.

THE APPLICATION PROCESS

"Filling out the application is a full-time job in itself," Mendlen said. "I remember feeling as though I had completed a marathon when I pushed that submit button."

Mendlen applied for the college two years ago and was one of few students who were accepted on their first try. Not everyone is accepted, though. According to the College of Veterinary Medicine's Web site, there were 133 qualified applicants to the college for the class of 2010. Only 46 spots were offered, and 45 of those accepted.

Many students who do not make it into the college on their first attempt will take a year to gain experience through work or go on to graduate school, Mendlen said. A majority will repeat the application process several times before being accepted.

Along with the online application, students applying to the college also are required to take the Graduate Record Exam, a basic academic knowledge test similar to an ACT or SAT, Mendlen said. They also have specific prerequisite classes within their majors.

Mendlen also said students should try to make their application a "water-tight basket."

"If you know your weaknesses, meet them head-on," Mendlen said. "Just try and make every aspect of your application solid. The essay, the grades, everything."

When Mendlen, originally from San Diego, was applying to veterinary medicine programs, K-State was at the bottom of her list, she said. But as soon as she stepped on campus for a visit, she knew it was where she wanted to be.

"I have friends at vet schools all across the country," Mendlen said. "But I can guarantee that I'm happier here at K-State."

Hand is hoping to join Mendlen, along with the rest of the students already in the college, next fall, she said.

"I feel very strongly about my application," Hand said. "I think I have something great to offer the profession."

Hand also said that if she is not accepted into the College of Veterinary Medicine, she will reapply and spend the year improving her chances. However, she is not opposed to other options, like graduate school.

In the first part of January, students will be notified if they have been invited for a 30-minute, scheduled interview. After this interview, final decisions are made and those accepted into the college can relax, Hand said.

"I am so nervous," Hand said. "It will be a big relief once this is all over."

Columnist analyzes presidential elections after Labor Day events

The following article is an editorial from the Tuesday, Sept. 3, 1984, edition of the K-State Collegian. With the passing of Labor Day and a national focus concentrated on the 2008 presidential election, take a glance at the events happening the day after Labor Day during the 1984 presidential race.

BATTLE OF THE PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES

By Dan Owens

With the passing of another relaxing Labor Day, America finds itself caught up in the 48th campaign for the presidency of the United States. Labor Day is viewed as the traditional starting point for the fall campaign, though it seems that both President Reagan and Walter Mondale have engaged in extensive preseason campaigning this summer.

Still, both men spoke of "kicking off" their campaigns Monday, so after six months of primaries and two months of convention hoopla, it seems that the beef of the fall campaign has finally arrived. Some observations on what this election campaign will bring:

First, look for the campaign to be extremely polarized. If there is any issue on which the two parties agree, it is that there is a clear-cut choice available to voters this year: The two rivals seem to disagree on every issue — from passing the Equal Rights Amendment to reducing the deficit, and from legislating morality to dealing with the Russians. Very real differences exist between the candidates' positions, and each side will try to heighten those differences.

Another thing you can bet on is that this campaign will be an especially vicious one. Of course, the democrats will try to present the voters with a negative view of Reagan. Being the party out of power, they have to give the voters a good reason to put them back in. Apparently the Mondale strategists believe they have a better chance if they smear Ron first, and sell Walter second.

What is surprising is that Reagan has been attacking Mondale. Most observers thought that the president would refrain from directly attacking his opponent, letting George Bush and other leading republicans dirty their hands with the mudslinging. It was thought that this would help preserve the president's "nice guy" image.

But Reagan has abandoned that strategy and is now lashing out at Mondale and the democrats instead. The president's strategists see Reagan as a better offensive, rather than defensive, campaigner, so don't look for any Rose Garden strategy this year — the president will be out on the campaign trail, with both a good word for himself, and a bad one for the democrats.

If history is any guide, trends would seem to indicate a victory for the president this fall. In nine of the past 10 elections in which an elected president sought office again, the American public has either voted strongly for the incumbent or has dumped him. Only Wilson's 1916 re-election bid was close.

It doesn't appear that the election this fall is going to go decisively against the president. If Mondale wins, it will be in a close election. But if the historical trend is a good predictor, Reagan should trounce Mondale in November.

The president enjoys a strong lead in the polls, and some people are talking about another landslide election. But recent events indicate that this election will be closer than the polls currently show.

If the republicans were going to achieve a decisive victory this fall, August would have been the month they got their big boost. August was a disaster for the democrats, what with the Republican convention and the furor over Ferraro's taxes.

But while the GOP did move ahead in the polls, democratic hopes were not crushed. Ferraro handled herself admirably on the tax issue, so well that the image of her confidently responding to a very hostile press probably helped the Democrats' chances. And at the end of the month, the Democrats managed to secure an impressive group of endorsements, including that of 1980 presidential candidate John Anderson and the reassured support of Jesse Jackson.

The failure of the republicans to achieve a knockout blow in August shows there is still a very large group of Americans who are dissatisfied with the president's policies.

The difference in the polls between Reagan and Mondale isn't as great as the difference was on Labor Day prior to other landslide elections, such as Johnson and Goldwater, or Nixon and McGovern. It is much closer — in fact, about the same as that between Ford and Carter, and that race eventually was decided by a few thousand votes in Alaska and Hawaii.

Another factor that seems to favor the democrats is the potential black vote. Blacks voted in record numbers against conservative Barry Goldwater in 1964, and they must feel infinitely more threatened by Reagan than by Goldwater. If there was ever an election that can demonstrate black political power, this is it. With the increased interest generated by the Jackson campaign, the possibility of this happening becomes even stronger.

Some unknown factor will probably be crucial to the outcome of the election. It would be concern over the president's age, now 73, an international crisis, new revelations about Ferraro's taxes or a slip-up during the debates.

What is certain now is the democrats are behind, and time is running out for them. Mondale has shown the capacity to fight resourcefully when he's behind, but he is now facing the toughest fight of his life. If the democrats can succeed in turning out 100 million voters, and Mondale can make a good showing in the debates, he could achieve the greatest upset in history. If not, and Reagan wins again, the Republicans are likely to look upon their victory as a mandate or approval for their policies.

Either way, you can be sure that the next eight weeks will be the decisive period — and probably the last campaign for either Ronald Reagan or Walter Mondale.

Counseling, sports help handle stress

By Ashley Frey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Class, activities, work and an intense college social life can overwhelm a student.

According to college mental health statistics from the American Psychiatric Association, nearly 50 percent of all college students have reported feeling depressed to the point they have difficulty functioning in their college careers.

The question for most students is where can they go for help?

There are several on campus stress relievers available for K-State students.

Counseling Services and the Academic Assistance Center provide opportunities for students to help deal with mental stress. Peters Recreation Complex also offers classes and intramurals to help keep students in physical shape.

Counseling Services, located in the English and Counseling Services building, provides a variety of services for students including alcohol counseling, confidential counseling and group counseling.

"One option for students is to come in for service," Libby Malone, a predoctoral psychologist said. "But before they reach that point they can do some self care and learn how to manage their stress. Eating well, getting sleep and exercise are vital, and many students do not get that."

For those students who are feeling overwhelmed with academic classes, tutoring is available through the Academic Assistance Center and the Office of Student Life at Holton Hall.

Here, students can get set up with a tutor to find relief for classes that might be difficult or troubling.

To take another route in stress relief, students can attend classes held at the rec or play intramurals.

With a wide variety of classes offered, from yoga to kickboxing, students can choose how to relieve their stress. In addition to classes, intramurals are offered year-round in a variety of sports.

In addition to Malone's essentials for staying healthy, many students have their own ways of relieving stress.

"I like to talk to someone I feel that understands me," Natalie Cloud, sophomore in dietetics, said.

Another option for students living in the dorms, is to talk with their Resident Assistants.

RAs can offer living assistance and are available to students to discuss problems and concerns.

"It is very common for students to go to RAs when things are of concern," said Derek Jackson, assistant director of Housing and Dining Services. "They are there to be an intake. If they cannot help the student, they are well trained to getting them the next level of help."

Whether it is going to an RA or a class at the rec, students should choose any of these options to maintain mental health, or simply a method of their own.

Online directory increases Varney's sales

By Erin Fisher
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Varney's Bookstore acquired greater sales this fall semester after it gave students a chance to order textbooks on its Web site.

Jeff Levin, Varney's Bookstore manager, said sales were noticeably higher than average.

"Our online sales were up dramatically compared to before the online list," he said.

Along with sales, tens of thousands of people visit Varney's Web site, Levin said.

To order online students needed to know what courses they were enrolled in, Levin said.

The student could scroll through a list to find their particular focus of study and specific class.

The online ordering gave students several advantages, Levin said.

For each class, it was posted whether a textbook was required or recommended.

Other information also could be viewed, like whether the book was new or used, he said.

Varney's would like the chance to compete with other online sales, Levin said.

Several Web sites are in competition for textbook sales. Some of these include www.amazon.com and www.barnesandnoble.com.

Amazon's Web site includes a search bar for the title, author or ISBN number of a specific book.

On Barnes and Noble's Web site, members can save 30 percent on new textbooks.

Consumers also can buy used textbooks from Barnes and Noble. Much like www.amazon.com, a student's textbook can be found by typing in the author, title or ISBN number.

One Web site, www.bestwebbuys.com, gives students the opportunity to view textbooks from several different Web sites.

A student can see whether a textbook is new or used, as well as which store it is from and the total cost.

"We want to give students a fair warning when they buy online," Levin said.

"Make sure you factor in buyback, and be careful it's a legitimate site."

Delivery and pick-up options also were available to students, Levin said.

"It allowed students to be bagged and ready to go," he said. "Some of them had them shipped even to somewhere in Manhattan."

Levin said Varney's had prior experience with the process of selling and shipping books online.

"We've sold distance-learning books online for five or six years," he said.

Varney's plans to keep selling textbooks online each semester and intercession, including summer school, Levin said.

"We tried to be very user-friendly," he said.

"If we get feedback from the students, we'll incorporate that."

Alicia Hill, junior in marketing, said she chose not to order books online.

"I have before," she said. "But the books weren't really expensive to begin with."

Krista Ising, junior in English, said she ordered one used textbook from Varney's online list this semester.

"It was a lot cheaper," Ising said. "I think it's just easier and faster."

Ising also was aware of textbook Web sites other than Varney's, she said.

"You can go to places like Amazon and eBay too," she said.

Course preps students to study abroad by teaching Czech

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Imagine stepping off a high-speed train into the midst of gorgeous historical churches, towers and museums and seeing a breathtaking countryside of green hills and tall mountains. Now imagine wandering through this land unable to ask for directions or where the nearest bathroom is located.

This is exactly what the two-credit hour course Czech for Travelers in the Department of Modern Languages is trying to prepare K-State students for when studying abroad in the Czech Republic.

Lenka Hadamova, instructor for the course, said the department offers the small class once a week during the fall semester for students planning to study abroad in the spring.

"In the class, students will learn things like how to find a train, how to order food and how to ask for directions," she said. "We also talk about different Czech traditions, because going to a different culture, you have to get used to certain things. You're supposed to be sensitive to the country's traditions."

Czech for Travelers has been offered for the past six or seven years, primarily for architecture students who will travel abroad to Prague, Czech Republic, the following semester, said Robert Corum, head of the Department of Modern Languages.

He said the course is set up so students will learn a little Czech background, language and culture.

"Our ideal situation is to have a professor or instructor from that part of the Czech Republic who can tell students all about the city before they travel," Corum said.

That is where Hadamova comes in.

With a master's in education in Czech language and music education, the Czech native has been the instructor for Czech for Travelers for the past two fall semesters.

Hadamova was recruited from a group of K-State exchange students from the Czech Republic to teach the course.

"When I came here, I wanted to know as much about the American culture as I could so I didn't insult anyone," she said. "That's my message throughout the whole course. You are a visitor in the country so you are supposed to be sensitive to their traditions and know what is and is not appropriate."

Hadamova said though the course gives an adequate overview of the Czech Republic culture and language, she warns students during the first class that they will not be fluent in Czech or be completely void of a culture shock upon arrival.

"I cannot fully prepare students for the experience of being an American in the Czech Republic because I am Czech," Hadamova said.

But to try her best, Hadamova said she asks American students who have previously spent a semester in Prague to discuss their experiences for her class.

"It's a fairly small program," Corum said, "but I think it's a real service to the students — especially those who want to know a little more about the Czech language and the culture."

Lindsey Devries, fourth-year student in architecture, said she is taking the course not only because studying abroad is a required option for her major, but because she wants to learn more about her Czech background.

"I chose to study abroad because it's such a great experience and because of my heritage," Devries said. "I've heard the Czech Republic is a really fun place to travel. There is a lot of good architecture there and a lot of interesting things to see."

Greensburg to use new sustainability resources in rebuilding efforts

By Ali Johnson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Greensburg, Kan., is looking toward a greener future to increase the town's livability.

The tornado that devastated the small town in May 2007 gave the citizens, along with those contributing to its rebuilding efforts, the chance to look at ways to ensure the city would be around for future generations.

"Ninety-five percent of Greensburg's population is still gone," said Matt Deighton, volunteer coordinator for Greensburg's long-term recovery plan.

Greensburg is in need of volunteers to help build homes so people can return, he said.

"We need people who are willing to do manual labor and interested in economic development," Deighton said.

K-State's newly established Building on Breaks student organization wants to send a group there for spring break to help with the relief.

"We want to send groups to the places where we see the greatest need," said Ashley Wessel, president of Building on Breaks and junior in marketing.

Ideas to maintain the town's quality of life and quality for community living were outlined in the Greensburg and Kiowa County long-term community recovery plan.

The plan includes three key projects to help build a more sustainable future by using traditional design to reduce long-term cost and increase energy efficiency.

Greensburg has assessed the need for sustainability projects and discussed its importance but has not moved forward at this time Deighton said.

"The biggest factor right now is education and informing those in the process of rebuilding of the benefits that using greening methods will provide for the community's future," he said.

"In the short term we are doing what we can to reach those currently rebuilding to assist them in whatever ways we can to optimize the energy efficiency of their buildings and whatever other green principles we can help them incorporate into their homes and buildings," said Daniel Wallach, director of Greensburg GreenTown.

Greensburg is focused on establishing a Sustainable Development Resource office, sustainable building programs and identifying and utilizing energy alternatives, according to the recovery plan.

The Greensburg Sustainable Development Resource office will coordinate education events, workshops and training on the "Greensburg Green" Building Certification program.

There are three levels of green a building can reach and point values and guidelines that accompany the levels. These give builders a chance to choose which level they want to meet and how they will benefit.

A senior retirement community has begun its plans to rebuild and will integrate greening methods into its construction, said Fred Bentley, director of Rental Housing for the Kansas Housing Resources Corporation.

"Plans for the retirement community have been one of the first to give hope to the city council to rebuild," said Bentley.

The housing will be where the Greensburg High School once stood with the land donated by the school district and will have a capacity of 64.

Implementing sustainability projects like these will put Greensburg among the leaders of developing a community that meets the International Conservation Energy Code of 2003 while striving to exceed those standards by 40 percent, he said.

"The catch is to find a balance between cost-efficient and green-efficient homes," Bentley said.

The Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design Green Building Rating System is the nationally accepted benchmark for the design, construction, and operation of high performance green buildings, according to www.usgbc.org the council's Web site.

"Greensburg choosing to become a model green community has many, tremendous benefits," Wallach said. "Serving as the country's first prototypic green town affords Greensburg many opportunities, including greatly increased tourism, and national attention."

Funding for the sustainability plan will be costly, and a list of resources has been identified to implement the projects according to the recovery plan.

U.S. Department of Agriculture Rural Development of Kansas provides financing for greening projects.

The agency administers over 40 programs including housing, infrastructure, business and community programs. "Greening" is considered a part of an application for the funding assistance, said Tim Rogers, Housing Program Director for Kansas.

"The agency has also expanded its loan eligibility requirements to allow an individual applying for a home purchase to qualify for a larger loan amount to pay for any additional energy efficiency costs associated with the purchase or construction," Rogers said.

minimum wage, which is the lowest in the nation at $2.65 an hour," said Angela Hubler, member of the coalition.

In an unexpected turn, City Commissioner Bob Strawn also spoke on behalf of the coalition's mission. He urged citizens to work toward making a change.

"I encourage you to get involved," he said. "Talk to your representatives about your feelings."

Other guest speakers included Reps. Tom Hawk,

Sydney Carlin and Roger Reitz. Each shared a special message regarding the working force and their need for an increased minimum wage.

"We have a significant problem in this country because we are allowing the middle class to decline and ignoring the working class," Hawk said.

Hawk also addressed the issues surrounding health care and was applauded for his request to spread health care to those most in need.

When Carlin took to the stage, she expressed the needs of the working class to receive the best possible benefits and working conditions. Carlin compared the extremely low minimum wage of Kansas' citizens to the $7.50 an hour received by California's citizens. Her closing statement pointed guests in the direction of true change.

"The more we (in the legislature) hear from the independents at home, the more support we get from the lobbyists in Topeka," Carlin said. "You are the ones who really make a difference in government."

for fine arts.

Lugo said she enjoyed the final scene in the performance the most.

"They had to improvise in a very short amount of time," she said. "They did it. You have to have skill."

Comedy-improvisation performances provide college students a break from studying for classes, Lugo said. Chicago City Limits also has variety in its improvisation performances, she said.

"I know that if I ever go to another show of theirs, it won't be the same show," Lugo said. "That's something I'm not used to. I'm used to scripts."

"It's apparent that more people are on bikes, and some of these people have no place to ride," Whetstone said.

Savastano said the bike ride was an event that was just opener for the first time since 1989, which was former coach Bill Snyder's first year in Manhattan. Auburn, meanwhile, won its opener for the third time in four years and took a 3-0 edge over K-State in the all-time series.

"We're 0-1, but there's a lot of good 0-1 teams after today," Prince said.

Freeman finished 32-of-57 for 268 passing yards and a pair of interceptions. Running backs James Johnson and Leon Patton combined for just 22 yards on 10 carries.

K-State's only touchdown came on a trick play, one of several the Wildcats used against Auburn.

On 3rd-and-6 from the Auburn 21, Freeman threw a lateral pass to Nelson, who then lobbed the ball across the field to a wide-open Patton for a 10-6 lead.

Kicker Brooks Rossman extended the lead six minutes later with a 40-yard field goal, his second make of the day. But Auburn closed out the game with 17 unanswered points to avoid the upset.

"The first 58 minutes we were doing everything right, no missed assignments and everybody was tackling," linebacker Ian Campbell said. "Then everything just broke down and we stopped doing everything that got us to that point. Everybody tried to do too much. There are no moral victories — you have to give Auburn credit."

After posing on stage at the KatHouse Lounge for Zotci's fashion show "Dazzled," Vanessa Grabitz, sophomore in political science, walks the room. The show was put together to showcase the boutique's newest merchandise.

Heels clacked, candles glowed, fabric danced and bass blared Friday night at the KatHouse Lounge for the Zotci's Attire fashion show. Ten models with painted and bejeweled faces strutted their stuff while weaving through the bar. If anything, it was a "dazzling" sight.

SETTING THE MOOD

A red carpet led viewers into the dimly lit, intimate atmosphere of the KatHouse. White tea lights were placed carefully at every table and along the walls, while tulle of the same hue was gently wrapped around chairs, at the front of the stage and the railing of the spiraling staircase.

Quiet chatter soon turned into a heavy clamor as more students filled empty seats and show time approached. Stage hands, armed with hairspray and stopwatches, guarded the corner door where the models were to enter.

LIGHTS, MUSIC, FASHION

The models entered from either the corner door or the top of the staircase, stomped their way around customers and tables in the lounge, and struck a few attitude-inspired poses on the stage before exiting.

Silky, printed halters and sundresses dominated the show, which began at 9:10 p.m. sharp. Almost all tops were paired with slim-fitting jeans and a set of sky-high stilettos. The occasional solid jersey or metallic dress was thrown into the mix — with heels — but the majority of the pieces fell into the earlier category.

The hair and make-up on the models was nothing less than dramatic, but that is exactly what Lacey Frenzl, Zotci's manager, fashion show coordinator and K-State student, had envisioned.

"Dazzled is actually an imaginary girl I invented," said Frenzl. "She is confident, strong, independent, so sexy, smart, beautiful and just awesome in every single way."

Frenzl, junior in apparel marketing and public relations, said she wanted the models to embody one of the distinctive traits of 'Dazzled' including stunning, gorgeous, intelligent and determined.

In turn, each model was primed and preened to match her personality. Intensely teased hair, eye shadow masks, feather adorned locks, and cheeks and eyebrows covered in stick-on hearts and stars helped to give each model her own unique look.

"Basically, girls are dazzled," said Zotci's owner Sara Meyer of the theme. "Girls want to look cute. They want to look fun, and that's what we're about. We do the fashion shows just for fun."

Lori Elliott, senior in secondary education, attended the show and said she had a lot of fun seeing the artistic capabilities of the students and of the Manhattan community. She said she hopes stores like Zotci's will put on similar events in the future.

At the close of the show, all 10 models took one last victory lap around the Kat - House to the cheers and laughter of Meyer, Frenzl and the attendees. Meyer joined the models on stage to conclude the event with a colorful balloon drop.

"All in all, I think everyone was 'Dazzled,'" said Frenzl. "Everyone was absolutely stunned."

Group to play Aggie Fest

By Austin Apple
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Dead Girls Ruin Everything brings a high-energy, ear-busting performance to the stage when they play a show.

The band, which formed in 2003, as Podstar and Ultimate Fakebook were breaking up, recorded demos that same year in Oklahoma City.

Their name is a little bit deceiving, however, as the band plays heavily guitar-driven power-pop.

"The band name is a combination of song titles," said Cameron Hawk, band member.

"We basically put a bunch of song titles on a page and scrambled them up and found Dead Girls Ruin Everything."

The band members are Jojo Longbottom, lead guitar and vocals, Cameron Hawk, rhythm guitar and backup vocals, Nick Colby, bass, and Eric Melin, drums.

Colby was sick, so Hawk filled in on bass.

Eric Kleiner, sophomore at Manhattan High School, said he has been following the band for a while.

"Dead Girls Ruin Everything is one of the best local bands," he said. "They are a good band that comes from good bands."

Most of the band's songs are either about girls or things that make them angry.

"It sounds really generic, but most of our songs are about girls and relationships," Hawk said. "We also like to focus on certain things that piss us off."

The band has international distribution for their debut album, "What A Perfect Ending," which can be purchased at Sisters of Sound and in most major music stores.

There are also T-shirts available at Sisters of Sound.

Dead Girls Ruin Everything will perform as part of Aggie Fest 2007, Sept. 21-22.

Facilities files recall for sprinklers

By Mike Kelly
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Division of Facilities completed the voluntary recall program application to replace more than 600 recalled sprinkler heads scattered throughout campus, a facilities official said Tuesday.

Dale Boggs, associate director for building maintenance, said he personally sent the completed application for voluntary recall to Central Sprinkler Company before last Friday's deadline. Had Boggs not mailed the application, K-State would have been liable to replace all of the recalled sprinkler heads through its own funds.

"In five weeks, we canvassed the entire campus and all the buildings, and we have created a database," Boggs said. "We identified all the sprinkler heads on the recall, and we put the information in the recall packet and sent it away to them — certified mail — to make sure they would get it on time."

The voluntary recall program, funded by Central Sprinkler and the U.S. Consumer Safety Commission, began following a 2001 lawsuit in which Underwriters Laboratories, an independent testing agency, found that Central Sprinkler's O-ring sprinklers could degrade over time and affect the sprinklers' capacities. The report noted that contamination from salts, water and minerals could cause sprinkler heads to require a higher water pressure to operate than was available in some buildings.

According to the provisions of the recall, Central Sprinkler will contact K-State to confirm the recall and schedule equipment replacement.

"If I don't get that in a day or so, I will call them and find out where it's at," Boggs said. "When they get the information from us, they will evaluate the pictures that we sent and the type of classification."

While the replacement time frame is dependent upon Central Sprinkler, Ed Heptig, director of building maintenance for the Division of Facilities, said he and facilities would help to make sure that life on campus continues as scheduled.

"We will work around class schedules with them as much as possible to where we could do weekends and evenings so as not to disrupt classes," he said. "If they come in and say this head has

Exhibit promotes breast cancer awareness on campus

By Christine Caplinger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Comments like "For my Mom! You will always be in my heart! I love you!" or "Thank you for those who are fighting back, you are making a difference," were scrawled across the once-white graffiti wall.

The wall was one element in the Komen on the Go education and outreach tour Tuesday at the Bosco Student Plaza.

Susan G. Komen for the Cure Foundation sponsored the traveling trailer, which was open and free to the public. Volunteers giving out information and stickers included members from Sexual Health Awareness Peer Education, Smurthwaite Scholarship House and K-State students who have known the effects of breast cancer.

Joy Busch, Komen On the Go event execution coordinator, said K-State was chosen for this event because of its demographics. The Komen on the Go tour will visit about 150 campuses and communities in 2007.

"We were looking at college universities that had really good demographics," Busch said. "We wanted a good amount of people, a good amount of women and minority students. K-State was a great place for this."

According to the Susan G. Komen for the Cure foundation, breast cancer is the most frequently diagnosed cancer among women. A woman has about a one-in-eight lifetime risk of developing breast cancer. One woman is diagnosed every three minutes and dies every 13 minutes.

After watching the interactive video and exploring the Komen for the Cure Web site, students had an opportunity to enter a raffle for an iPod Shuffle or a Ford "Warriors in Pink" scarf.

There were many interactive activities to do on the trailer, including a tutorial on monthly self-breast exams.

"I think the most interesting thing is that you actually learn the most researched, up-to-date information on how to do a breast exam," said Carol Kennedy, director of health promotions and nutrition counseling at Lafene Health Center. "It is new, cutting-edge information that traditional college students need to know because this is when women should start examining their breasts to know what is normal and when something is abnormal."

Being informed and practicing monthly self-breast exams is an important part of Komen on the Go, Busch said.

"My favorite thing on the trailer is the video," Busch said. "When I go to the doctor, they tell me to do a monthly self-breast exam but they don't show me how to do it."

Breast cancer does not just affect women. Men also are Student struck by car in crosswalk

Lisle Alderton | COLLEGIAN

A K-State student is loaded into a Riley County EMS ambulance after being hit by a car as he crossed the street on Denison Avenue near Goodnow Hall on Tuesday afternoon.

STAFF REPORTS

A K-State student was struck by a car while walking across the street between the Engineering Complex and the south Goodnow Hall parking lot Tuesday.

The accident occurred just after 3:30 p.m.

The students was taken to the hospital by ambulance with minor injuries, a witness said.

The collision cracked most of the car's window, leaving a large dent in the middle.

The driver of the car, an older man, was not arrested and neither he nor the passenger of the vehicle were injured.

The police could not provide names or additional information.

Pilot involved in Salina's GlobalFlyer missing

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The aviator and pilot of a record-breaking aircraft that involved K-State-Salina in 2005-06 is missing since he left a private airstrip Monday morning.

Searchers and aircraft searched terrain Tuesday in western Nevada for Steve Fossett, who has broken numerous flight records.

Fossett, 63, was scouting a course for an attempt to break the land-speed record Monday, Maj. Cynthia S. Ryan, a Civil Air Patrol spokeswoman told the Associated Press on Tuesday.

K-State-Salina students and faculty members were involved in all three world record-breaking flights of the Virgin Atlantic GlobalFlyer aircraft in spring 2005 and spring 2006.

In summer 2006, the plane retired to the Smithsonian National Air and Space Museum's Steven F. Udvar-Hazy Center in Chantilly, Va.

"In aviation, you deal with things like this," said Pat Rinearson, a spring 2006 K-State-Salina graduate in airway science who worked mission control for all three world-record GlobalFlyer flights. "You're always cautiously optimistic until you hear the results, and I think that's where we're all at right now."

TIGER SAYS THANKS, BUT NO HANK

Tiger Woods was so disgusted with his form at last month's Open Championship that he decided to tweak his swing, and the results were immediately apparent as he won the World Golf Championships.

To suggest his coach, Hank Haney, is on the way out would be an exaggeration, but Woods increasingly is working on his own. Haney was not at the PGA and is not expected to be a regular presence at tournaments.

One man who has noticed the changes in Woods' swing is Ian Baker-Finch, the commentator with the American CBS network.

"Hank and Tiger are great friends. They continue to talk, and Hank is still Tiger's coach in a way, but I think Tiger is using Hank more as a sounding board," Baker-Finch said.

Brittney Exline, a record-setting teen-genius was as anxious as any other incoming freshman on the campus of University of Pennsylvania. But Exline is only 15.

"I've been three grades ahead since sixth grade," Exline said.

At 15, Exline is the youngest black woman ever to be accepted into an Ivy League school.

"All of the Ivy League decisions come out on the same day. So I found out I was rejected from Harvard and wait listed at Columbia, but then when I got into Penn. It was really exciting," Exline said.

She scored 1400 on her SATs and won scholarships and grants to pay her full tuition at Penn.

WHOOPI DEFENDS VICK

So much for the sedate alternative to Rosie O'Donnell on "The View."

Whoopi Goldberg used her first day on the daytime chat show Tuesday to defend football star Michael Vick in his dogfighting case.

Goldberg said that "from where he comes from" in the South, dogfighting isn't that unusual.

"It's like cockfighting in Puerto Rico," she said. "There are certain things that are indicative to certain parts of the country."

Professor completes laureateship

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In the basement of Eisenhower Hall, in a room scattered with papers and books, is a man who has made history in the arts of Kansas.

Jonathan Holden, distinguished professor of English, was the first Kansas poet laureate and served the position from July 2005 to June 2007 when he gave readings of his work around the state. Now he is settled back at K-State teaching students poetry, and he likes it best that way.

"It comes naturally if one is an artist," he said. "One wants to teach people - that is what artists do."

According to the Library of Congress' Web site, Kansas' poet laureate position was created in 2004 by Gov. Kathleen Sebelius and the Kansas Arts Commission.

Margaret Weisbrod Morris, program manager for the Kansas Arts Commission, said the position was created to honor and encourage poetry in the state.

"Kansas has a pretty solid history of producing poets," she said.

Morris said the role of the poet laureate is to travel the state and promote poetry, as well as develop a project for the two-year term.

She said Holden's project was a Shoptalk Series that included interviewing poets and discussing the history of poetry.

Morris said the selection of the poet laureate was a combination of a nomination and application process.

Elizabeth Dodd, professor of English, said Holden has the honor as the only distinguished professor of English at K-State.

"Jonathan has been a mentor to really almost two generations of poets in Kansas," she said, "and so he has been a formative presence in the literary community of the state."

"So I am sure it was an honor for him to receive the position, but it was also entirely appropriate given his stature in the state."

Holden said it is a relief Kansas has a poet laureate because, until recently, the state has not had one, though other states adopted the position many years earlier.

"It suggests that enough people here value reading and poetry," he said.

As the poet laureate, Holden

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

Jonathan Holden, distinguished professor of English, was the first Kansas poet laureate and served the position from July 2005 to June 2007. His duties as poet laureate included traveling the state and giving readings of some of his poems.

en said he was invited to give readings at universities around the state. However, he said he is glad the position ended because he does not like to travel.

Holden said he thinks poetry is good for people, though it is an acquired taste.

He said poetry is about capturing an experience.

"The main subject matter of poetry is to capture the rites of passage, which we all go through," Holden said.

When teaching students, Holden said he encourages them to pay attention to their lives and experiences so when they write from experience, they can write with emotional honesty.

Holden said he writes continually. He has published 21 books in different genres and said his favorite is "poetry, of course."

"I've always wanted to be a writer - not just of poetry - but a writer," he said.

Recently, Holden said a common theme in his poetry has been the subject of reading and books because he is an avid reader.

"All the writers that I know - that is what we do. We read," he said. "Serious writers are serious readers."

Holden spoke warmly of his favorite author, William Stafford, who was a Kansas poet. He recited the author's poem, "This book," from memory where the speaker in the poem is a book.

He also has written "The Mark to Turn: A Reading of William Stafford's Poetry," an analysis of several of Stafford's poems.

Although he is not a Kansas native, Holden said he came to K-State in 1977 and decided to settle.

"The university has treated me especially well, and I have given back to them," he said.

Program reunites K-State alumni through worldwide travels

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ron and Rae Iman stood in awe of Michelangelo's statue "David" while in Florence, Italy. They also saw the Great Wall of China and followed in the footsteps of Lewis and Clark along the Columbia River.

Through all their travels, the Imans have been in the company of K-State alumni, and by next year, the Imans will have completed 10 trips with the Traveling Wildcats program.

Terin Daily, associate director of administration programs for the K-State Alumni Association, said the Traveling Wildcats program was initiated in 1969 and offers trips year-round to alumni.

"Our primary goal is for some alumni, especially the ones that don't live in Manhattan - it is their most personal touch to K-State," she said. "A lot of our travelers don't live in Kansas. This is their way to stay connected."

Daily said the program works with travel companies that plan the trip itineraries.

The trips are contracted one year in advance and reservations are on a first-come, first-served basis.

Daily said the program typically offers several trips a month, though it is a struggle to plan trips for November and December because of the holidays.

In the month of September alone, the program offers three trips - Germany and the Czech Republic, the Italian Lakes and French Alps, and India.

The Imans, New Mexico residents, traveled with the program since 1994 and participated in one or two trips a year.

"The reason you want to travel with the K-State folks is that as soon as you get the group together, you have an instant family," Ron Iman said. "It is the K-State family that sells the cohesiveness that I don't think you see in a lot of schools."

Iman said the trips are always well planned in accordance with the weather at the designated location. He said they also are affordable.

The Imans have become friends with other K-State alumni travelers and continue to travel with them on other trips.

During the trips, the program tries to have a Wildcat social for passengers to get to know one another. If someone associated with the K-State faculty is traveling with the group, they might give a university update, Daily said.

Iman said he served a four-year term on the alumni board and spoke on behalf of the Alumni Association while on a trip in Italy.

He said the group promotes K-State by flying K-State flags and by sporting university memorabilia on the trips.

Besides K-State alumni, the Imans also have met alumni from other universities.

Daily said the program often shares departure times with other university alumni programs, and it tries to offer the same departure dates as other Big 12 schools.

"Most of our trips are in conjunction with other alumni associations," she said. "Sometimes the travel companies try to pair us up with people from schools they know the alumni will mesh well with."

The number of K-State alumni on a specific trip depends on each location, Daily said. Popular trips like Australia and Alaska have had more than 45 travelers, while some trips might have less than 10.

Iman said there was a trip shortly after the Sept. 11th attacks to Sweden and Denmark when he and his wife were the only alumni from K-State.

Trisha Brooke, Missouri resident, went with the Traveling Wildcats to Rome and Florence, Italy, in March 2007 with a former college roommate.

She said the best part of the trip was the excursion to Pompeii, Italy, where artifacts remained after a volcanic eruption.

"It was incredible to see how much of the buried city that they have uncovered and how much they continue to uncover," she said.

Brooke, a 1994 graduate in interior architecture, is a lifetime member of the Alumni Association and receives literature about the trips.

"I had been talking about going back to Europe and really wanted to go to Italy and see the things that I studied while in school at K-State," she said.

Brooke said she has met many alumni who graduated from a wide spectrum of years through the program.

"I think the Traveling Wildcats is a great opportunity to get together with other alumni and also to reunite with fellow classmates," she said. "It is an adventure to be able to see different parts of the world with a group of people that you have a common factor with."

For more information about Traveling Wildcats, contact Terin Daily (785) 532-5052 or visit www.k-state.com/programs/travelingwildcats.

TO THE POINT

Exhibit valuable to all

Komen on the Go, sponsored by the Susan G. Komen Foundation, was a great traveling learning center to have on the K-State campus Tuesday.

Komen on the Go presented information to people passing through Bosco Student Plaza and relayed important messages about breast cancer education and awareness.

An important message relayed to passers-by was that, like women, men can be affected by breast cancer.

Some men are affected physically by breast cancer, but the way most are subjected to breast cancer is by knowing a woman – a family member or a friend – who is affected by the disease.

As they provide support for women in their lives who have been diagnosed, men commonly are a commonly overlooked aspect of breast cancer.

Komen on the Go was also a great resource for information concerning monthly self-breast exams and breast cancer research.

Important tools in fighting breast cancer include early detection by performing regular breast examinations.

Many visitors to the Komen on the Go exhibit said they knew they should be conducting self-exams but never were shown how to do so until they visited the trailer.

The learning center also shared with its visitors the importance of supporting further research to find a cure, and Komen on the Go provided information on ways to support breast cancer research. To find out more, go to www.komen.org.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Rush Limbaugh and Sean Hannity are the top radio talk show hosts in the nation.

Now say hello to a few of the liberal talk show hosts: Alan Colmes, Al Franken and Randi Rhodes.

CHUCK ARMSTRONG

According to Talkers magazine – the industry's bible – Limbaugh reaches more than 13.5 million listeners, and more than 12.5 million listeners tune into Hannity's show.

A weak 1.25 million hear Colmes, Franken and Rhodes every day.

Many liberals want to fix this imbalance by allowing the government to mandate equal coverage of any public issue of importance. A resurrection of the Fairness Doctrine, a liberal's dream come true.

In 1949, the Federal Communications Commission created the Fairness Doctrine, a regulation requiring anyone holding a broadcast license to give equal coverage of any public issue of importance. (Whether an issue was controversial or not was decided by the FCC.)

If a listener felt a station was not giving a balanced view, they could file a complaint with the FCC.

Jim McKinney, former head of the FCC's Mass Media Bureau, said when a complaint was filed his staff would "pull out stopwatches" and time how long the issue was on the air.

Then, McKinney said, either the investigation would be closed, or "they would prepare an item for the commission to take an enforcement action."

This regulation tried to provide more opinions and information for the American public. However, it actually did the opposite.

Michael Harrison, editor of Talkers, said because of this doctrine, "there was very little provocative ... or even pertinent political speech on the radio." Station managers did not want to waste the time or pay the money required by the FCC to investigate complaints.

In 1985, Mark S. Fowler, a communications attorney serving on Ronald Reagan's campaign staff, said the regulation hurt the public interest and violated the First Amendment. In 1987, the FCC abolished the doctrine. Afterward, talk radio exploded and created the spectrum many know and love today.

Unfortunately, many Democrats want to revive this archaic regulation.

Illinois Senator Dick Durbin said, "I have this old-fashioned attitude that when Americans hear both sides of the story, they're in a better position to make a decision," insinuating there is no option for those who want to hear a different side to a story than those like Limbaugh or Hannity's.

By looking at the audiences who listen to each show, it is obvious U.S. citizens would rather listen to conservatives than liberals. However, that is not because there are few liberal talk shows.

Liberals actually created a liberal radio network (I refuse to call it progressive) called "Air America." It ended quickly due to bankruptcy but is facing restructure and is back in business.

The reality is when the Fairness Doctrine was created, few talk-radio stations existed. On-air personality Rush Limbaugh described his start in radio and said, "When I started, there were 125 talk stations. Today there are 2,000. The idea that there are fewer ideas expressed, that there is less diversity, is absurd."

Bob Grant, a New York radio legend, said he worked with the Fairness Doctrine governing his every word. "I must tell you that I am glad it is not in effect now," Grant said. "But ... don't think that because the Democrats may ram the Fairness Doctrine back down our throats that it means you can't continue. I am living proof that you can."

Senator should have fought for innocence

Maybe it is best that Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho, decided to step down.

He has none of those qualities. Craig pled guilty to a misdemeanor instead of the felony charge he might have deserved.

Senators are supposed to fight for honesty, truth and justice for the people of the United States.

Their role is to represent the citizens within their constituency and fight for those laws that matter to them. With these thoughts in mind, they are supposed to have values, morals and ethics.

If Craig believes he is innocent, he should have fought the accusation. Craig was a good senator; however, he did not uphold the ethics of a senator in his personal life.

Public officials must uphold the ideals of right and wrong, even in their private life. Craig lied to himself, his political party and the citizens he represented by signing an irreversible guilty plea. How can a man stand up for the citizens of his state when he can't stand up for himself?

After his arrest June 11 on charges of disorderly conduct, he should have fought for what he believed was right.

According to reports, Craig made hand signals under a bathroom stall during an undercover police sting operation.

Men use their hands for many reasons in public stalls. For all we know, he could have been gripping the bottom of the stall for the strength of the ever-promising power squeeze.

Craig was a U.S. Senator for 17 years. He obviously represented Idaho well enough to be elected for three terms. If he was a good representation of a senator for the state of Idaho, he should have defended himself.

Craig pled guilty to a lesser charge in hopes his lewd-act accusation would go away.

After pleading guilty, Craig addressed his actions in a press conference.

"In pleading guilty, I overreacted in Minneapolis, because of the stress of the Idaho Statesman's investigation and the rumors it has fueled around Idaho," he said.

"Again, that overreaction was a mistake, and I apologize for my misjudgment."

He was hoping the misdemeanor would smooth over faster in the media than the felony charge he would have to fight.

However, if he had the true qualities of a senator, he would have fought those charges. The United States is a country that lives by the philosophy, "innocent until proven guilty."

Craig never should have pled guilty unless he was actually guilty. At the same time, citizens of the United States should have been more accepting of him and his mistake of pleading guilty, even if he is homosexual.

Only time will tell if Craig will come out of the closet. It is sad citizens will have more of a prejudice against him.

He should have had the guts to finish his term and let the people decide his fate as a public official.

"Copper Truck," a 1960 Dodge truck, was turned into an art sculpture by Elliot Pujol, professor of art. It was the first sculpture installed in the new Beach Art Museum sculpture garden.

Copper truck 1st exhibit at expanded museum

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A K-State professor's copper-covered truck three decades in the making is the first piece of art on display in the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art's new sculpture garden.

A crane lowered the truck sculpture Tuesday morning into the Stolzer Family Foundation Gallery, the museum's new outdoor sculpture garden. The truck will remain on display in the sculpture garden until Aug. 31, 2008.

During the last 30 years, Elliot Pujol, professor of art, said he worked on the sculpture mostly during summers. The truck sculpture, a 1960 Dodge, actually started out as a joke, he said.

While living in Pennsylvania, Pujol said he attached pewter to a rusted area so it would pass inspection. When he moved to Kansas in the early 1970s, Pujol said he then started applying copper.

Despite three decades of work on the truck, Pujol said the truck sculpture is not complete.

"Eventually, I want to have it so that it looks like it's sinking into the ground and put dirt in the bed of the truck and plant sunflowers," Pujol said. "I also want to take out the transmission, moon roof and floor and plant a tree. I also want to photograph and record it as it continues to grow."

Pujol said museum attendees should keep an open mind when viewing the sculpture garden.

"A sculpture can be anything you want it to be, and this one happens to deal with form and texture," Pujol said. "I am hoping that people will scratch their heads and say, 'Is that the next thing he's going to do?'"

The museum is closed until Oct. 21 in preparation for the grand opening of its expansion. The $7-million expansion — all raised through donations — includes the expansion, renovations to the original museum and fixtures like special units for storing artwork.

In addition to the outdoor sculpture garden, the 17,000-square-foot addition will feature two new gallery rooms.

The sculpture garden will feature temporary exhibits, and it serves as a transition between the old and new sections of the museum, said Martha Scott, museum business and marketing manager.

"With the truck being covered in copper and the accents on the building being copper, we thought it would be a nice tie-in with the two together," Scott said.

The garden allows the museum to showcase outdoor artwork that was not available prior to the addition, Scott said.

"It's nice that we'll be able to add another dimension to what we're able to have on display," she said.

Museum director Lorne Render said he originally saw pictures of Pujol's truck in a catalog of Pujol's artwork. When selecting the first sculpture for the garden, Render said he immediately thought of the truck.

"It's a nice piece, and it's nice to have a K-State artist featured at the beginning of the show," Render said. "It all evolved together."

The sculpture garden will allow the museum to showcase larger exhibits like the truck, Render said. He also said sculpture will not receive protection from weather-related effects like snow and rain.

"We're looking forward to being able to work with artists in showing a wider range of art," he said. "It'll be interesting to see how different seasons will affect the artwork."

Fraud affecting stores nationwide

By Dawn Murphy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A retail-fraud scheme is targeting grocery stores across the country, according to a press release from the office of the Kansas attorney general.

So far, none of the Manhattan grocery stores have been affected; however, they still are taking precautions.

Ashley Anstaett, spokeswoman for Kansas Attorney General Paul J. Morrison's office, said for this specific fraud scheme, the accounts payable department of the grocery store gets an e-mail from someone claiming to be a vendor.

The "vendor" writes they have changed their banking information and requests all future payments be remitted and sent to a new bank account.

The new bank account belongs to someone thinking they are doing legitimate business, Anstaett said. But as soon as the money is deposited into the new account, the fraudulent vendor asks the bank account holder to wire the money to a foreign bank account.

Andy Fischer, store manager at Ray's Apple Market, said retail fraud never has been an issue at his store.

"The type of fraud we've had here so far is mostly counterfeit coupons and bad checks," Fischer said.

"Basically, people are printing off fake coupons from the Internet and then trying to use them here in the store."

Joe Grennan, store manager of ALDI grocery store, said ALDI is completely safe from retail fraud.

"We don't have any vendors — all of our products are in-house," Grennan said. "We also don't have an e-mail account yet, either."

He said the store takes only debit and cash and does not accept checks or credit cards.

"We might have an e-mail account in the future, but if so, it will no doubt be very closely monitored," Grennan said.

Anstaett said employees in Morrison's office work with people in other states in case scammers try to operate from state to state.

"This situation is similar to identity theft," Anstaett said. "We wanted to warn both consumers and businesses in the state of Kansas. Basically, we want to increase awareness and make sure that people and businesses know the implications of retail and identity theft."

"The same things that one can do to prevent identity theft can also be used to prevent retail fraud," she said.

"The best thing to do is to call vendors directly and verify all personal business information over the phone."

Anstaett said it is important to verify the identity of all vendors.

Cathy Benco, assistant manager at the People's Grocery and Co-op, agreed.

"We stick with the same vendors and never change," she said.

"We personally verify all information over the phone, so fraud isn't really a concern here."

Anstaett said the implications of a store affected by retail fraud include losing significant amounts of money and paying high legal fees.

Stores must pay to attempt to recover lost money from retail fraud. It is very difficult for stores to recover lost money, she said.

"There have been no official reports of retail fraud in the state of Kansas so far, but it could still happen, and so it is a legitimate concern," Anstaett said.

Robert Hayes, store manager at People's Grocery and Co-op, agreed that retail fraud is an important issue.

"I think that all grocery stores in Manhattan should be aware of it," he said, "even though we've personally never had a problem with it here."

Prince stands tall in defeat

Believe it or not, there were a lot of positives to be taken out of K-State's season opener. And if you are somehow able to detach yourself from the fact that the Wildcats opened their season with a loss for the first time since 1989, maybe you'll be able to spot some of them.

JEFFREY RAKE

Not only were the Wildcats quite good, but they also displayed a level of poise and confidence that I'm not sure we've seen from them in recent years.

Ron Prince's Harlem Globetrotter offense, the one he used throughout the third quarter, was not only flashy but brilliant. So was the game plan, which had K-State more than prepared to win. Most importantly to me, though, was the accountability the team displayed following the loss. It was telling.

There weren't many excuses floating around. No finger pointing, either. Instead we saw a team that's genuinely interested in growing together, even if it means doing so in defeat.

The best vibes came from the coach.

Prince, as you might already know, wanted to win the Auburn game badly. He put up with unfair criticism during the off-season for scheduling the Tigers, a team that entered the game as double-digit favorites.

But the Wildcats, as Prince suspected they would, played competitively. In fact, they were more than that. The offense played with a bit of a swagger in the second half. The defense, up until that final drive, looked like a suffocating unit that can control games the way the Lynch Mob did during all those 11-win seasons. Even the special teams, led by Brooks Rossman and his 2-for-2 night, looked solid.

Prince had a plan to beat Auburn. It nearly worked. Had his players executed a notch better, had they not been whistled for all those penalties, they easily could have escaped with a win. Of course, it didn't happen.

Yet there was Prince, at his weekly press conference, accepting much of the blame for his team's defeat. It was one of those captain-goes-down-with-the-ship moments.

Sure, he pointed out many of the mistakes his team made. But he really placed an emphasis on his own miscues. He was far more critical of himself than he was of his players. That's a rarity in coaching these days, where griping about officials or turnovers or penalties is often the easy out.

A coach can't change what he doesn't acknowledge. That's why many of them flame out after a few poor seasons that don't quite live up to expectations. Yet even on a night when Prince's coaching kept his team in a game it probably had no business being in, he still evaluated himself with a critical eye. That's the sign of a leader — a man with a vision.

K-State's football team will grow with its coach. Prince, as we found out in the second half, has some areas where he can mature.

Prince is re-evaluating all his decisions, and in addition, he's probably taking a look at other ways in which he can help his team improve.

It's that specific attention to detail, that willingness to evaluate and critique every phase of what goes into winning, that continues to make me a believer in Prince even after a damning 0-1 start to the season.

Prince is looking out for his players. He wants them to grow within the foundation he has set for the program. He's shown, at least up until this point, that he can lead.

By holding himself accountable, he sent a message to his players. I'll coach, you play.

Debunking the myths

Popular fitness untruths can keep students from the gym

When it comes to working out — or not working out — everyone has an excuse, whether it is because you are too busy or you do not want to bulk up. Here's the truth about a few popular exercise myths.

"I DON'T WANT TO BULK UP!"

Ladies, you know you have at least thought this at one point in your lives. It makes sense — you see a bunch of beefy guys lifting weights, and you think it could happen to anyone. That's not true.

Men produce way more testosterone than women, making it difficult for females to bulk up to that degree. However, it's not impossible.

According to the American Council on Exercise, whether a woman can get big bulky muscles also depends on her genetics and how she lifts weights.

If you overload your muscles to a certain extent, they are going to increase in size. However, if you lift moderate weights and do more reps rather than a few reps of heavy weight, you are going to be increasing endurance instead of adding bulk.

"IF I DO 200 CRUNCHES A DAY I'LL HAVE GREAT LOWER ABS."

This is really two myths rolled into one. First of all, if you can do 200 crunches, you are not doing them correctly.

For a beginner, you should only be able to do about 15-30 crunches properly before you start to feel the burn.

A proper crunch would mean you are using your abdominal muscles, exhaling maximally at the top of your crunch and not relying on momentum to get through the set.

Secondly, you do not have lower abs. You have different layers of abs that consist of the transverse abdominals, which wrap around you like a seat belt; the internal and external obliques, which help you twist your torso; and your rectus abdominus, or your six-pack muscles.

KENDALL HALL

Your rectus abdominus is not actually six separate muscles but one long muscle that has connective tissue sheets running in a grid pattern along it, making it look like separate muscles. So you see, no lower abs.

The last part of this myth involves cardiovascular training. It does not matter how many crunches you do. If you have fat around your middle, you are not going to see the muscles underneath.

You need to add some kind of cardiovascular training to your routine to slim down and really see the great progress you are making.

"I'M TOO BUSY TO GET TO THE GYM."

Exercise should not be that thing you do when you have extra time. No one (especially college students) has extra time.

The surgeon general recommends healthy adults get at least 30 minutes of moderate-intensity aerobic exercise five days a week or 20 minutes of vigorous activity for three days a week, according to the American Heart Association and the American College of Sports Medicine.

Exercise is something that should be scheduled into your day, and it should be a priority. When you think about all the health and benefits, exercise should be as much a mainstay in your routine as brushing your teeth. And if you don't brush your teeth on a daily basis, well, you probably have other prioritizing issues.

Keep in mind, a lot of misinformation is floating around. If you are not sure about what you have heard somewhere, do not be afraid to ask. Fitness professionals like those you see at the Peters Recreation Complex do their best to keep up on the research and help you stay informed. There really is nothing worse than thinking you are doing something beneficial, only to discover you are wasting time you did not think you had to begin with.

Freeman OK after awkward hook slide at Auburn game

By Jeff Rake
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

There's no need to worry about K-State quarterback Josh Freeman, whose 15-yard rushing attempt Saturday at Auburn was capped off with an awkward hook slide that saw him come up lame.

He walked around fine at K-State's weekly press conference on Monday and said he felt healthy despite having a few bruises.

"It hurt a little bit but nothing too bad," Freeman said.

If you don't believe him, and if the medical diagnosis provided by ESPN's commentators during the Auburn game has you concerned, allow coach Ron Prince to put your mind at ease.

Prince, after watching the ESPN telecast following his team's 23-13 loss against Auburn, said the two on-air commentators — play-by-play man Ron Franklin and analyst Ed Cunningham — got a bit carried away while trying to play doctor.

"The commentators, I think, were reading a little more into that," Prince said. "I guess one guy may have stayed at a Holiday Inn Express, and so he was trying to do a pretty good job of diagnosing. I'm not sure what medical college he went to, but I'm sure he's well-qualified to make that assertion."

Prince's comments might have been in jest, but backup quarterback Carson Coffman was seen warming up along the K-State sideline shortly after the play. Freeman said he saw Coffman, but knew he would be able to stay in the game.

He will be ready to go at 6:05 p.m. Saturday when K-State takes on San Jose State at Snyder Family Stadium for its home opener.

DEFENSIVE LINE MUST PROVE ITSELF

After holding Auburn's offense to 23 points and only 291 yards, Prince was asked if he felt his defense sent a message to the nation.

Prince was unwilling to go that far, reminding reporters that his defense gave up a go-ahead touchdown late in the game. And great defenses, Prince said, find a way to make that stop.

Had the Wildcats not allowed Gabe McKenzie to catch the go-ahead touchdown pass with 2:01 remaining, perhaps Prince would be able to offer more congratulatory remarks. Until then, it's back to work.

"I can't say we're a great defense, but we're aspiring to be one," Prince said.

On that note, some players, like linebacker Reggie Walker, still had difficulty putting the drive behind them. Though Walker said his focus is entirely on the San Jose State game this weekend, he couldn't help reliving the play just once more.

"It's just really frustrating because we could have done better," Walker said. "I don't know what I would compare it to, it's just very disheartening ... there's plays I wish I could take back."

MULTIPLE PENALTIES TROUBLING

Prior to offensive lineman Alesana Alesana being whistled for a false start late in the first quarter, K-State had gone 8 minutes, 52 seconds without a penalty.

But after the Wildcats got the first one out of the way, the yellow flags just kept coming. By game's end K-State had 16 penalties, including a 15-yard offensive face mask — a penalty Prince said he's never seen called in all his years as a coach — on wide receiver Jordy Nelson.

In all, the penalties cost K-State 141 yards, a number that displeased Prince and one that caught safety Marcus Watts by surprise.

"I didn't really realize how many penalties we had until I saw it, but you can't win any football games with 16 penalties," Watts said. "We'll get that corrected this week, we'll talk about it and we'll move forward."

Well, maybe not quite yet.

"Some of them I thought were bogus calls," Watts said, "but you've got to live with it."

QUICK NOTES

— Prince said the offensive line scored out well when he and the coaches evaluated them. The Wildcats allowed only two sacks in 57 pass attempts by Freeman.

— Prince would not further update the status of Joshua Moore, who was ruled academically ineligible prior to the start of the Auburn game.

— The Wildcats might have gotten carried away with the trick plays in the third quarter against Auburn, but don't think they're all used up. Said wide receiver Deon Murphy: "I think we have a few of them."

Clayton, Diles, Figurs earn NFL roster spots in rookie seasons

Twenty former Wildcats survived Sunday's final round of NFL roster cuts.

Rookies Zac Diles and Yamon Figurs made the cut in Houston and Baltimore, respectively, while the San Francisco 49ers signed rookie Thomas Clayton to the practice squad.

Former Wildcats Jon McGraw and Damion McIntosh made the Kansas City Chiefs' 53-man active roster.

Missouri coach Pinkel admits mistake

The "comedy of errors" that plagued Missouri in a 40-34 win over Illinois included one highly noticed flub of his own, coach Gary Pinkel now admits.

Two days after defending his decision to try a 2-point conversion after taking a 13-6 lead in the second quarter of Saturday's game, Pinkel said Monday on his weekly coach's show that the decision was a mistake.

"An error was made.

That's the truth," he said during the broadcast. "That's inexcusable. That could have cost us the game."

The conversion in question came after Cornelius "Pig" Brown's 100-yard fumble return for a touchdown that put Missouri ahead by seven. The Tigers called for a direct snap to wide receiver Jeremy Maclin, who ran to his right and was tackled well short of the goal line.

WORLD NEWS

FELIX HITS CENTRAL AMERICA AS HENRIETTE ROARS INTO BAJA CALIF.

CABO SAN LUCAS, Mexico — Hurricane Felix walloped Central America's remote Miskito coastline and, Hurricane Henriette slammed into resorts on the tip of Baja California as a record-setting hurricane season got even wilder Tuesday with twin storms making landfall on the same day.

While weakening rapidly, Felix's rains posed a danger to inland villages lying in flood-prone mountain valleys and to urban shantytowns susceptible to mudslides.

Felix roared ashore before dawn as a Category 5 storm along Nicaragua's remote northeast corner — an isolated, swampy jungle where people get around mainly by canoe. The 160 mph winds peeled roofs off shelters and a police station, knocked down electric poles and stripped small homes.

"The metal roofs are coming off like straight razors and flying against the trees and homes," Lumberto Campbell, a local official in Puerto Cabezas, near Felix's landfall, told Radio Ya shortly before his phone line went dead.

Emergency official Samuel Perez said most of the port's buildings were damaged and the dock was destroyed, though there were no reports of deaths.

Felix weakened steadily throughout the day and shortly after nightfall, it was downgraded to a tropical storm, with winds of 60 mph. But forecasters still were worried the storm would do great damage inland over Honduras and Guatemala.

Up to 25 inches of rain was expected to drench the mountain capitals of Tegucigalpa and Guatemala City, where shantytowns cling precariously to hillsides.

BUSH MEETS WITH IRAQ ALLY BEFORE ASIA ECONOMIC FORUM

SYDNEY, Australia — President Bush briefed one of his few remaining staunch war allies, telling Australian Prime Minister John Howard Wednesday about his Iraq visit and his conviction that the U.S. troop buildup is working.

The two leaders exchanged pleasantries before talks at the Commonwealth Parliament Offices within sight of Sydney Harbor.

"You told me it was beautiful," the president observed.

Bush was spending much of Wednesday with Howard ahead of a 21-nation Asia-Pacific summit later in the week. Bush was also to meet with Australian troops.

His visit was expected to be accompanied by a series of protests by groups unhappy with the summit's pro-business agenda, the Iraq war and the Howard government's support for it.

PAKISTAN REELS FROM SUICIDE ATTACKS NEAR ARMY HQ

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — President Gen. Pervez Musharraf and exiled rival Benazir Bhutto have moved closer to a deal that could see them share power and restore democracy to Pakistan, Bhutto's party and the government said Tuesday.

The pact also is supposed to bolster Pakistan's fight against extremism, a need underlined by twin suicide attacks Tuesday that killed at least 25 people and wounded 68 near the capital.

The bombings tore through a high-security area of Rawalpindi, the city where Pakistan's army has its headquarters. The deadliest blast devastated a Defense Ministry bus, killing 18 military and civilian employees.

Authorities suspected the attacks were linked to pro-Taliban militants near the Afghan border. The violence deepened the sense of crisis in Pakistan, already roiled by political uncertainty ahead of elections.

RIDING THE COATTAILS

Garfunkel just a good voice; musician lacked usable talent

Art Garfunkel is the luckiest man in rock 'n' roll.

This is because Garfunkel, of the legendary group Simon and Garfunkel, took a back seat when it came to creativity. He was only valuable to the group because of his distinct vocal talents.

Before we begin, the purpose of this article is not to bash Garfunkel's accomplishments or to bring him down in any way. It is to demonstrate the fact anybody with a decent voice could have filled in for him, and nothing would have changed.

The best place to start is the beginning.

The first musical group Garfunkel was affiliated with was a duo with Paul Simon called Tom and Jerry. The two met in elementary school and began performing together while they were juniors in high school.

Soon after, the group became Simon and Garfunkel and achieved major international fame. The big break for the duo came with the release of the movie, 'The Graduate,' starring Dustin Hoffman.

The film's soundtrack included several Simon and Garfunkel tunes and made the two a household name.

Despite all the success, Simon and Garfunkel fought constantly and had many artistic debates, ending with the duo's breakup of the duo. Despite constant breakups the pair never stayed away from each other for long and always reunited for the music they were so good at making.

It is important to note a large majority of the music performed by Simon and Garfunkel was written by Paul Simon, with Garfunkel serving as a second voice to the sound.

Nine of the 12 songs on Paul Simon's first full album made their way onto later albums by Simon and Garfunkel.

After many albums and tours, Simon and Garfunkel took their first long-term break after many fights in the recording studio.

The last release by the duo has brought Garfunkel out of oblivion and put a name to his face for many Americans.

The recording, 'Bridge Over Troubled Water,' won the band three Grammys including Best Song, Best Record and Album of the Year.

After taking a short break from the music industry, Garfunkel decided the time was right to begin working on his first solo album. Garfunkel worked with many famous songwriters and composers to create material for the album.

It is important to realize that even after breaking up with Paul Simon, Garfunkel still relied heavily on the songwriting of other people to make up the material for his records.

Around the time his first record came out, Garfunkel reunited with Simon to work on the Simon and Garfunkel greatest hits compilation. The release of the record was near the release of the greatest hits LP and took 'Angel Clare,' Garfunkel's first record, with it up the charts. Coincidence?

Garfunkel continued to work with several well-known and respected songwriters to come up with material for many more albums in the following years. The more material he released, the worse it did on the charts. No record Garfunkel came out with on his own ever matched the success of his first release, or even dared to challenge the success of any work done by the duo.

The biggest moment for Garfunkel came in the summer of 1981 when Simon and Garfunkel reunited for the famous Central Park Concert.

More than 500,000 people witnessed the concert, where the two produced what is widely regarded as the greatest version of 'Bridge over Troubled Water.'

Once again riding on the coattails of Simon, Garfunkel had to be tracked down by Simon and convinced to do the show.

The duo reunited for the night and rocked the crowd for hours. Following the success of the concert, it was announced Simon and Garfunkel would be reuniting for a world reunion tour.

Garfunkel, who was working on yet another studio album, put all his work on hold to tour with Simon again.

Other than having a long and successful career, the one thing said of Garfunkel is that he has a great voice.

He is, however, lacking in almost every other talent column most other famous musicians have.

He never played an instrument or wrote a hit song - he was content with singing the lyrics that someone else wrote.

Had he written anything at all, it would be easier to make the argument for Garfunkel's musical credibility. But since he was only a talented voice box, Garfunkel is the luckiest man in Rock 'n' Roll.

Eric Davis is a senior in print journalism. Please send comments to edge@pub.ksu.edu.

Ringo Starr is the luckiest man in rock 'n' roll.

This is not to say that he is the least talented or has produced the worst music, because he is a good drummer and has influenced some great music.

However, Starr was not just any other musician; he was a Beatle.

Arguably the most influential rock group in history, the Beatles produced 27 No. 1 hits in the United States, providing countless anthems for an entire generation.

The meat of the Beatles' genius was its original trio: John Lennon, Paul McCartney and George Harrison. John was the front man, Paul was the face and George wailed on the guitar.

John and Paul have come to be remembered as the lyricists, writing approximately 75 percent of the group's repertoire. George quietly wrote the remainder, but few of the hits.

Ringo is remembered as the latecomer to the group joining five years after the original inception of the Quarrymen (former name of the Beatles).

The Beatles' first permanent drummer was Peter Best, and though he was asked to leave the band by the three original members, he was there for the first record deal.

Ringo, who at the time was playing for Rory Storm and the Hurricanes, sat in for the Beatles during times when Best was sick and was asked to join the group in 1962.

Ringo fit in with the Beatles well enough. He was the definition of consistency by steadying the beat and adding to the signature sound.

In fact, many credit him with changing the face of the modern drummer from that of a soloist to an equal in the band. Though Ringo was not a soloist, he also was no equal to any of the other Beatles.

Yes, Ringo usually did sing on at least one track of each of the Beatles' studio albums, but his parts usually were written by Lennon or McCartney. Ringo's vocal range was vastly smaller than the rest of the Beatles and limited him as a baritone.

Starr lucky to be surrounded by music greats like 3 other Beatles

Though recognized with several co-writing credits, Ringo only received two sole songwriter titles: one for the White Album's 'Don't Pass Me By' and the other for 'Octopus's Garden.'

Many Beatles fans do not realize Ringo was not the only Beatle to ever play the skins on a studio album.

On the Beatles' first-ever single, the classic 'Love Me Do,' session drummer Andy White played the drums.

The Beatles' manager George Martin brought in White to replace of Peter Best.

Martin claims not to have realized the Beatles had hired a new drummer, but rumors remain that Martin was hoping for White to mix well with the band. Ringo was demoted to tambourine on 'Love Me Do,' and maracas on 'P.S. I Love You.'

On the 1968 White Album, McCartney played the drums in the first two tracks, 'Back in the U.S.S.R.' and 'Dear Prudence' after Ringo walked out, claiming he was sick of the tensions infiltrating the band and tired of waiting to contribute.

McCartney also played the drums on 1968's 'The Ballad of John and Yoko.'

He did not end his cry-baby campaign until all three members of the band urged him back.

During this holdout, Starr spent time 'opening his mind' on a yacht with actor Peter Sellers and writing what became 'Octopus's Garden.'

Once the Beatles broke up, Starr continued to ride the steady flow of Beatle mania all the way to the bank. He quickly released two solo albums, 'Sentimental Journey' and 'Beaucoups Blues,' and starred in D-list movies like 'The Magic Christian' and 'Blindman.'

I still don't know why he hasn't been invited for VH1's 'The Surreal Life.'

After Starr's 1973 solo album 'Ringo,' the Starr came back down to earth. No longer having Apple Records or the other Beatles to fall back on, Starr bounced around between record labels, releasing unsuccessful albums and limiting his options.

With few other places to turn, he founded his own record label, Ring O'Records, and continued to produce and release well-enough renowned music, though it never caught on much with the general public.

To put it simply, Ringo Starr was the only Beatle not to top the United Kingdom single charts as a solo artist.

He also is the only Beatle to not top the album charts, where his peak position was seventh with both 'Sentimental Journey' and 'Ringo.' Without the trio, Ringo was nothing more than a solid drummer.

Though he clearly was a talented musician, he will forever be overshadowed by the brilliance that surrounded him.

THE LUCKIEST MUSICIAN OF ALL TIME
ART GARFUNKEL VS.
RINGO STARR

This is the first of many battle pages that will run this semester on The Edge page. While the main point is satirical, the facts are true and the authors are passionate about their respective topics.

Today's battle is about the luckiest man in rock 'n' roll. If you have a suggestion for a battle topic, e-mail The Edge editor Eric Davis at edge@pub.ksu.edu.

KOMEN | Center stresses self-examinations affected, either by the women they know or even breast cancer themselves, Kennedy said.

"Men are always going to be affected by their female friends and family members, so it is kind of a universal problem for everyone," Kennedy said. "Susan G. Komen (for the Cure) has put a lot of emphasis into enriching communities because of this."

Megan Moloney, junior in history, said she thought Komen on the Go increased awareness of breast cancer and answered questions people were afraid to ask.

"I think it is important to get the knowledge out to people who are misinformed and or have a hard time asking questions," Moloney said.

Komen on the Go targets college-aged people because they want to make younger generations aware their actions now might save their lives later.

"The main reason we want to go to college campuses is that we want to put it out that breast cancer is not just an old-woman thing," Busch said. "Young women can get it as well. We really want to inform young women of that."

More than anything, Komen on the Go is made to show young adults how important early detection by proper breast screenings and research is to the fight against breast cancer, Kennedy said.

"I think they are increasing awareness that this is an issue that affects everybody," Kennedy said. "There are some things we can do, and there is a possibility for a cure. That's what we all really ultimately want."

Danielle Hudgens, senior in family studies and human services, passes out pink ribbon stickers to students going into the K-State Student Union Tuesday afternoon as part of the Komen on the Go breast cancer exhibit.

"I think if anyone can survive a day in Nevada like that, it's definitely Steve Fossett."

Fossett did not file a flight plan, which is not required on flights using visual navigation. Ryan also said authorities are analyzing information from radar intelligence in hopes of tracking Fossett.

"Steve is a tough old boot," Virgin Atlantic president Sir Richard Branson said in a written statement Tuesday.

"I suspect he is waiting by his plane right now for someone to pick him up."

"The ranch he took off from covers a huge area, and Steve has had far tougher challenges to overcome in the past."

"Based on his track record, I feel confident we'll get some good news soon."

the potential of malfunctioning in an hour, yeah, I think they have the trump card there, but I don't think we'll run into that."

Randy Slover, director of fire inspection for public safety, said Larry Zentz and Paul Wilson, both employees of public safety, completed an initial inspection in May that documented the presence of recalled sprinkler heads. The division of facilities then began compiling the recall packet to send to Central Sprinkler.

"Dale (Boggs) did a heck of a job getting his guys together and out on these buildings," Heptig said. "There's a heck of a lot of work that they did in a short time to get this thing taken care of."

While both Boggs and Heptig said sprinkler heads are an important part of a fire-prevention system, they are not the only method of defense protecting the K-State community.

"A fire system in a building is a complex system, and there's a lot of inputs and outputs in the fire alarm system that we have," Boggs said. "Every piece of this is safety, so it is all important and we keep it all functioning properly."

Heptig said there is a possibility a sprinkler could be a first line of defense, but even in that situation, there are other methods of protection still in place to ensure campus safety.

"More than likely, you're going to have a smoke detector going off first," Heptig said. "It just depends on the flame. Who knows where they are or what activates that flame to melt the head? If I knew that, I wouldn't be in this business."

As with any public-safety system, general compliance is necessary for the system to be successful.

Slover said each part of the fire-safety system is important, especially evacuation when an alarm sounds.

"Sprinklers do save lives," Slover said. "They are a very important part of life safety; they contain the fire or extinguish the fire. However, people need to leave when an alarm goes off."

Former professor seeks appeal for 2005 murder conviction

By Emily Sterk
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Thomas Murray, former K-State English professor, has appealed his conviction of first-degree murder.

The appeal is set for this morning, and the results of the court ruling could be as early as October.

Murray was convicted in 2005 after his ex-wife, Carmin D. Ross, was found beaten and stabbed to death on November 14, 2003. He was sentenced to life in prison with the possibility of parole after 25 years.

Angela Wilson, district attorney in Douglas County, explained the appeal process in an e-mail.

"If he wins his appeal, the only thing he wins is a new trial," Wilson said.

Wilson said the difference between an appeal and an actual trial is an appeal is based on briefs, and a trial provides evidence and witnesses.

"The jury found as a fact that Professor Murray killed Carmin Ross," Wilson said. "Now he is trying to provide a legal excuse for why he should get another chance to make the state prove to a different jury that he killed her."

However, appeals rarely are granted, Wilson said.

According to the NBC Action News Web site, Murray's attorney, Sarah Ellen Johnson, said that Murray's first trial was based on theory instead of fact.

"The state's case against Mr. Murray rested not on concrete evidence, but on speculation, inference and hunches," Johnson said.

Johnson makes four arguments for her client's appeal, according to a Lawrence Journal-World report.

First, she mentions a drop of blood found in Ross' bathroom that has been linked to Murray. The initial DNA test run on the blood found on the baseboard of Ross' bathroom was a questionable match to Murray's DNA.

"But Wilson countered that Murray told detectives,

'I guarantee you'll find a drop of my blood' in the bathroom," according to a Lawrence Journal-World report.

There was no hair or other DNA found in Murray's car, home or the crime scene, according to NBC action news.

"The state's case was a house of cards built on dozens of minor circumstances," Johnson said in an NBC Action News report. "The evidence was not overwhelming. Remove any of the one circumstances and the entire case against Mr. Murray could collapse."

Johnson's second point involved the Miranda Warning.

Court judge Robert Fairchild said the prosecutors could use a testimony from Det. Pat Pollok. Now Pollok might not have a follow-up interview with Murray because he no longer could be interviewed.

"The right to silence is meaningless if the invocation

Businesses move in as city expands

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Since the downtown redevelopment project began, rumors have circulated about which restaurants and stores will move in or out. With all of the negotiation, it is hard to keep up, but City Manager Ron Fehr has set the record straight — at least for now.

DOWNTOWN REDEVELOPMENT

Dial Realty, developers of the project, have announced that Bed Bath & Beyond has signed a lease, Fehr said. The home décor store is planning to locate in the north end of the downtown redevelopment project near Best Buy and McAlister's Deli.

Dial also has projected an OfficeMax, PETCO and a Mountain Mudd Espresso and Coffee kiosk for the same area. Fehr said Mountain Mudd will occupy the drive through, which is attached to the east side of McAlister's and is expected to open sometime this fall.

Brandi Branfort, sophomore in business, said she is happy to hear about the PETCO, because she said Manhattan does not have any decent pet stores, but she said she is most excited for the Bed Bath & Beyond.

Kris Pacinelli, senior in mechanical engineering, said he agrees.

"I can finally get to use my 20-percent off coupons, since I get one in the mail from the store in Topeka every week," Pacinelli said. "Plus, I sure am sick of going to Wal-Mart and Target for all my house supplies."

Fehr also said Dial has proposed the installment of a Hy-Vee grocery store. However, Branfort said she does not necessarily believe bringing in another supermarket is a smart move.

TOP: The future building for the International House of Pancakes is under construction at the McCall area development site along Tuttle Creek Boulevard, and it is about 80 percent finished. Other restaurants being built in the development area include Pizza Hut, Wendy's and Taco Bell.

LEFT: A Pizza Hut in the McCall area development is one of four restaurants that will open as part of Manhattan's redevelopment projects. It is still uncertain when the restaurant will open.

RIGHT: Wendy's is the only restaurant in the development to have opened, and the three other ones are at various stages of construction.

"I think it's pretty dumb to put another grocery store between a Walgreens, Wal-Mart and a Dillons," Branfort said. "It doesn't really make sense."

But nothing is set in stone yet. The Hy-Vee has signed a letter of intent, Fehr said, but it still must go through the rezoning process before anything is finalized.

"The goal of the north end redevelopment was estimated as a mixed-use area of commercial retail and residential business to improve the community," he said. "It will hopefully strengthen our community to make the downtown area a strong, viable market and enhance the original downtown core."

Fehr said the north end redevelopment also will be the primary financing to provide for a south end redevelopment. This will allow the city to take advantage of the $50 million in star bonds to create a second entertainment district downtown. The entertainment district, he said, is proposed to include a new hotel conference

Chinese 101 students, mentors meet for dinner party

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Li Su, Cheng Cheng and Shen Shen attended the Chinese language partner party Wednesday night in the Flint Hills Room at the K-State Student Union.

The party served as an introduction for Chinese 101 students and their native Chinese K-State student mentors.

"Being a Chinese language partner, I can make a lot of friends," Shen said. "It's also a way for me to broaden my horizons."

The Department of Modern Languages has had a Chinese program since 2005, said Wei Wu, program director and instructor of Chinese. The program has about 70 students, which includes more than 40 students enrolled in Chinese 101 alone, she said.

"To learn a language, the best way is to learn to speak with a native speaker," Wu said.

Chinese 101 student Matt Kerl, junior in finance and international business, is partnered with Xin Zheng, sophomore in accounting.

"China has the world's largest population, so I thought it'd be good to learn the language," Kerl said.

"In the future, there's going to be a lot of business opportunities with China, so it's important to learn the language."

As Kerl's Chinese language partner, Zheng said he will help Kerl with his pronunciations and draw Chinese characters.

Mid-Campus Drive to close tonight for less than 3 hours

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Mid-Campus Drive will close from 5:30-8 tonight for road repaving.

Emergency-vehicle access still will be available on Mid-Campus Drive during the closing, said Darwin Abbott, director of K-State's Parking Services.

Abbott also said because of relocating high-voltage electric lines along the street on campus, only northbound, on-campus traffic from Anderson Avenue to College Heights Road will remain open today and Friday.

Two-way traffic on 17th Street is expected to open again by 8 p.m. Friday, Abbott said.

All parking shuttle systems from the Bramlage Coliseum parking lots to the K-State Student Union will continue to operate, he said.

The Information Booth also is relocated temporarily to the east parking lot of the K-State Alumni Center until Friday night, Abbott said.

"We think by doing it this way it'll work much faster," Abbott said.

"We've tried to do this as quickly as possible for the university. The contractors are working hard to minimize the impact to the university."

FarmHouse named top chapter in U.S.

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's FarmHouse chapter gained status as the best chapter in the nation for the first time in its 86-year history in winning the Ruby Cup.

Matt Begnoche, chapter president and senior in architectural engineering, said he received notice of the accomplishment through a phone call from the chapter's executive director.

"We've placed second in overall chapter excellence for the last three years, and this is our first time actually winning, so it's pretty exciting," Begnoche said.

Each year, the fraternity is required to submit a Chapter Award of Excellence report to FarmHouse international headquarters that evaluates the chapter based on 12 different achievement areas. Those areas include new member education, total member education, recruitment, spiritual development, scholarship, physical development, community service, risk management, alumni relations, social moral development, financial management and campus involvement.

Begnoche said the chapter ranked first or second in 11 of the 12 categories out of 28 total FarmHouse chapters.

Andy Gigstad, FarmHouse secretary, said Begnoche sent out a mass text message to all K-State FarmHouse members in early August informing them they had won.

"Everybody was calling each other and really talking about it," said Gigstad, junior in agricultural business. "This is something we've wanted for a really long time, and it was really satisfying for all the work we have put into our chapter."

Grant Helmers, who was an active member from 2001-05, said K-State had been in contention of winning the award for several years.

Helmets, FarmHouse Alumni Association Board secretary, said the presentation of the Ruby Cup will take place at the annual alumni banquet Oct. 6 at the K-State Alumni Center. He said prospective attendees include Chad Harris, FarmHouse international president, active members and chapter alumni. The presentation ceremony is an all-day event, which will include the K-State vs. KU football game and a dinner banquet.

"I'm hoping that winning the Ruby Cup will affect us in a positive way," Gigstad said, "and that we look at it as an achievement of our hard work as well as a motivational tool to stay on top."

"Now we know how we stack up against some other chapters around the nation, and hopefully we can help some struggling chapters while continuing to make ours grow."

Pre-med student likes K-State's 'hometown feeling'

By Christine Caplinger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For some students, life after college is not quite clear yet. However, Michael Page, junior in nutrition science, will start medical school soon and is open to all the options it might bring him.

For what reasons did you choose to go to K-State?
Primarily, I came to K-State because of FarmHouse Fraternity. It was an environment I was looking to enter during college. Also, K-State was more like my personality. It seemed to be a lot more friendly and personable.

What is your favorite aspect of K-State?
Community. I really like the hometown feeling. Everyone has that nice personality, and you feel like you are wanted here. K-State doesn't make you feel like just another person. The staff and professors that stick out in my mind genuinely care for you and want you to succeed.

What are some organizations that you are involved in?
KSU Navigators, FarmHouse Fraternity, and I was in Silver Key Sophomore Honorary my sophomore year.

What are your plans after you graduate?
To go to the KU School of Medicine. Hopefully after that I will see where medicine will lead me - medical missions work, rural Kansas, who knows. I know that I want to be somewhere that I am truly needed and called to.

How have you prepared for medical school?
Shadowing primarily. I shadowed at Children's Mercy Hospital in Kansas City (Mo.) for a week shadowing pediatric specialists, and also various research at K-State. One (research project) with physics concepts and the other assisting cancer research in the nutrition science department.

What has been your biggest challenge while at K-State?
Using my time wisely. It was difficult going from not needing to be organized in college to becoming organized. And studying efficiently.

Where do you see yourself in five years?
In five years, I should be entering my third year of medical school, which would involve doing more rotations and less lecture in different specialties.

After graduating from K-State, Michael Page, junior in nutritional sciences, said he plans to attend the University of Kansas School of Medicine.

How has K-State prepared you for medical school?
Right now, the wonderful blessing of the cadaver dissection team for the Human Anatomy and Physiology course. You can learn on paper, but actually seeing the human anatomy changes your whole perspective. You get to see the actual thing, and you don't have to make an abstraction or imagine it in your mind.

TO THE POINT

Bicycle safety a must

Traditionally, bicyclists have not gotten along with pedestrians and motorists on campus, and the on-campus traffic flow problems plaguing the K-State community does not help matters.

The major on-campus construction has caused several road closings, thus altering the way all traffic moves through campus.

The resulting routes often cause cars and bikes to cross paths in different places and ways than they normally would.

Rather than peace and harmony, the result of the new interactions often cause problems. There are, however, easy steps all parties can take to ensure safer interactions.

The most important thing anyone can do is pay attention. Whether in a car or on a bike, constant vigilance by all will help the exchanges go more smoothly.

Of course, any time students ride bikes, they should wear proper safety gear should be applied.

If the rider is unwilling to go all the way and don knee, elbow and wrist pads, at least a helmet can do quite a bit in the prevention of serious brain trauma.

Often, injuries sustained to the brain or head in bike wrecks could have been prevented had the rider been wearing a helmet.

Lastly, the most important thing is patience.

The inconvenience will not last long and will be easier to bear with a positive mental attitude rather than a frown.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Generation has responsibility for civil rights in this era

In 1967, interracial marriage was legalized. A mere 40 years ago, a white man and a black woman could not wed.

Luckily, with the help of a progressive protest and some brave judges, the decision was reversed.

Unfortunately, history has a way of repeating itself. The war to make all people equal in this country is on again.

This past week, a judge in a small county in Iowa struck his gavel on the side of freedom for all people. According to the Los Angeles Times on Sept. 1, a judge in Polk County, Iowa, lifted the marriage ban on, but the case was over-turned only 12 hours later.

National Public Radio noted in its Morning Edition on April 16, gay marriage has been struck down a mere 12 times in federal courts.

David Buckel, senior attorney for a leading gay advocacy group, is optimistic because of the short fight they have had in comparison to how long interracial marriage fought to be legal.

The reasons someone are opposed to gay marriage are similar to the ones like interracial marriage. Many think it would be the downfall of marriage. The makers of this claim do not seem deterred by the fact 50 percent of marriages end in divorce, according to www.divorcecase.org.

It's time the truth is stated: banning gay marriage is the last acceptable form of discrimination.

Never missing a chance to feel morally superior, Kansas among other states has the audacity to tell a large number of its citizens they are not fit to be married and are providing our generation with a civil-rights struggle that will define us.

Generations of the past have fought for equality from the 19th Amendment to the Civil Rights acts of the 1960s. The face of adversity has presented itself in so many forms over the years that sometimes we forget the answers to even the greatest of problems begin with a single step forward.

In regards to the arguments for why laws are necessary to protect marriage, I have this to say: If three years of higher education, staffing two state congressional races and multiple conversations with intelligent people have taught me anything, it is that the only justification for banning gay marriage is a religious-based justification. This puts the United States on a slippery slope.

Transcribing something as subjective as religious beliefs into the laws of a country, which has a million different beliefs, exposes the United States to the same anarchy that can be found in the genocide-torn areas of Africa, terrorist networks in the Middle East and "The Crucible."

If your reasons are biblically based, keep reading the Scriptures; there are far more references to acceptance and change than to casting judgment. If your reasons are hate-based, seek counseling immediately following the reading of this column.

In the meantime, let's stop legislating about marriage. If you do not believe the government should have anything to do with marriage at all, that is perfectly valid.

Marriage is an extremely personal experience any two people who love each other should have the opportunity to take part in. It should not be a government program.

Every generation has its moment to change the status quo, and this is ours. Just think: one county judge in Iowa established what the L.A. Times, the New York Times and Washington Times are calling a key issue in the upcoming presidential primary.

MEGAN MOLITOR

In grade school, many of us played tag — not just normal tag, but much-enjoyed variations like line tag, octopus tag and countless others. No child's elementary school experience is complete without these games.

It's a simple concept. One child chases another, usually with one stiff arm out, ready to dive in order to graze the shirt of their opponent. Usually, an argument ensues about whether or not an actual "tag" has taken place. Upon agreement, the chaser becomes the chaser, and the process repeats itself.

Tag occupies time in recess and gym class, and it gives kids a healthy sense of competition. However, for years, a battle has raged about whether or not tag belongs in U.S. schools.

Recently, this argument surfaced again. According to an Aug. 30 Forbes.com article, a Colorado Springs, Colo., elementary school has banned tag on its playgrounds after some children complained they were harassed or chased against their will.

All this accomplishes is turning our children into whiny complainers who can't handle a little competition.

It is tag, not a gang fight. Administrators and parents take such great pains to shield their children from every possible downfall or hardship that we have stripped down childhoods to the minimum.

When I was in elementary school, if I had come home crying because some other kid tagged me on the playground, I guarantee I would have been told to toughen up a little and tag them back.

It's not a difficult concept. It is life. Some people are going to be faster and better at things, and some are going to be slower and need more time.

Simply cutting out all activities highlighting this in everyday life, even at a young age, is only doing a child harm. Getting a child used to both winning and losing, not to mention competing and standing up for oneself, will make the child stronger and more stable. They will become ready for real life when it comes at them.

Tag is a game, just like Monopoly and Duck Duck Goose. If schools are going to ban a game, what about one involving smacking other kids on the head while running around in a circle?

We need to start realizing learning life's lessons happens more on the playground than it ever will in the classroom.

Tag is not harming children any more than their math classes are, and we will produce better individuals with a little more strength of character just by letting them play a game.

ASK THE 5TH YEAR

Boycott underwear industry

WHY IS IT THAT UNDERWEAR ALWAYS RIDES UP?

That is the question in life, isn't it? For centuries, physicists and philosophers alike have come across many things they are unable to explain, but none so baffling as underwear's unwavering ability to defy gravity.

ADAM REICHENBERGER

I mean what's the deal with the elastic band? Clearly it just makes the problem worse. Why haven't manufacturers done anything about this universal crisis? How have their sales not plummeted?

I'll tell you how, because of fools like you. Follow me ... toss all your underwear out. Go commando, and let the world know. Due to declining profits, Hanes and Fruit of the Loom will be forced to do something drastic.

Maybe they'll solve the conundrum and produce the world's best underwear that won't ride up, fully equipped with rocket boosters and daily fresh scents.

We can only pray that day will come. Until then I'll suffer through the chaffing of this zipper, because there's no way I'm giving in and wearing The Man's underwear. No sir.

MY NEW BOYFRIEND'S FACEBOOK PROFILE STILL SAYS HE'S SINGLE. SHOULD I BE CONCERNED?

You can't see this, but I'm banging my face on the desk right now. What is the deal with Facebook?

I hear people talking about relationships and whether or not it's "Facebook official." You've got to be kidding me.

If Facebook is a defining step in your relationship, it probably won't last anyway, so, no, I wouldn't be concerned.

Facebook doesn't matter. Often things on it are taken out of context. My sister thought I was suicidal because I had some Nirvana lyrics on my profile. Seriously?

True love will find you in the end, and I seriously doubt it's scanning Facebook profiles to do so.

MY ROOMMATE IS EATING ALL MY FOOD. WHAT CAN I DO?

In high school, a friend of mine used to steal my drinks and finish them while I wasn't looking.

One day I bought a lemonade, went to the bathroom, downed it and quickly refilled it with my own "lemonade". I came back to class, set it down and went to talk to the teacher. Moments later I turned to see him jetting out the door. The bottle was half empty.

This was one of the greatest moments of my life, and now I'll always have the upper hand. No matter what he does, he drank my urine.

Remember all that underwear you're not wearing? Bake a pair or two of that into a pie and leave it out. If biting into a pair of Snoopy boxers won't turn him off from eating your food, then you've got quite a prick of a roommate.

Here's another tip: try kicking him in the junk every time he eats your food. It's like Pavlov's dog. Eventually he'll stop, or he'll go sterile and develop an extreme case of erectile dysfunction. Either way, you will always have the upper hand.

HOW TO HIP-HOP

Bust a move

Hip-hop an easy-to-learn hobby to show off in Aggieville

Hip-hop music has had a great influence on the lives of many young people and many cannot stop themselves from dancing when they hear their favorite song.

ERIN FISHER

Dancing is a big aspect of hip-hop culture. Over the course of the last year, many people have developed an interest in certain new hip-hop dances.

Whether out with your friends, driving in your car or flipping through TV channels, there is a big chance you have heard a few hip-hop songs.

If you have not turned on the radio or watched MTV in the past month, you might not have had a taste of the latest hip-hop dances. Several new hip-hop style dances have become popular at dance clubs and parties.

A recent trend of rappers featuring their own favorite styles of dancing through their songs is gaining speed in the music world. "Crank Dat (Soulja Boy)" by Soulja Boy and "2 Step" by DJ Unk have become two of the most popular hip-hop songs in the last few months.

The level of difficulty for these dances might vary based mainly on the amount of rhythm the dancer has. Many styles of dance require flexibility and using some technique, but "The Soulja Boy" and "2 Step" require none of these, making them easy and great to know.

Hip-hop footwork like the "C-walk" and "heel-toe" are popular, as well.

The "Soulja Boy" requires basic knowledge of "The Motorcycle," a move Yung Joc in his music video, "It's Goin' Down."

Once "The Motorcycle" is learned, you can continue learning the rest of the dance. It includes simple footwork, and "The Superman" which is used during the chorus of the song. When attempting "The Superman," pretend you are flying by making a swimming motion with your hands in the air.

The "Soulja Boy" can be learned quickly by watching the music video once or twice, as it is danced about 10 times during the video.

The lyrics of "2 Step" explain how to do the dance. When he says "take two steps to the left and two steps to the right," you do as instructed.

After practicing all the steps to each song, you will confident when going out to dance with your friends. Even if you are not partial to hip-hop, these dances are fun and easy to learn. Keep in mind, there are many more dances other than the "Soulja Boy" and the "2 Step." If you cannot get enough of hip-hop dancing, you can take hip-hop classes at the Peters Recreation Complex or any dance studio in town.

Keeping up with dancing trends can be difficult. But after learning something new, the sense of accomplishment makes it all worthwhile.

Erin Fisher is a freshman in pre-journalism. Please send comments to edge@pub.ksu.edu.

"THE MOTORCYCLE"

This move is danced by Yung Joc in his music video, "It's Goin' Down." Simply use both hands and pretend as if you are revving a motorcycle engine to the left of your body, then switch to the right. If you are using this move for Yung Joc's song, you will rev twice.

If you are using it for "The Soulja boy" you will rev three times. Each time you rev, lean your body back. While performing this move, bounce with your body in the same direction you are revving the motorcycle.

"THE C-WALK"

Draw a backwards "C" with your left foot out toward the front of your body. Next, draw a normal "C" with your right foot toward the front of your body. You should start with your foot behind you body and move it to the front of your body in the shape of a "C."

"THE HEEL-TOE"

The "heel-toe" is sometimes considered a more difficult move. Start with placing one heel and one toe, from opposite feet, on the ground and drag, or swivel, your feet to the side while keeping on your heel and toe.

For example, if your left heel and right toe are on the ground, you will swivel them to the left. If your right heel and left toe are on the ground, you will swivel them to the right.

Apple announces new lineup of iPods

For the first time in more than a year, Apple has released the newest iPods.

In an all-new version, Apple is coming out with the iPod touch, essentially the iPhone without the phone. The iPod touch comes in 8- and 16-gigabyte sizes, and users will be able to access a version of the iTunes Music Store on the device.

The iPod touch will be the first iPod to have WiFi capabilities.

The iPod nano received a facelift and now looks like a smaller version of the new iPod classic. The nano still comes in 4- and 8-GB sizes, and the new classic will come in 80- and 160-GB sizes.

Also announced are the plans for Apple and Starbucks to merge as well as the price reduction in the iPhone from $599 to $399.

Jim Colbert finished second in the NCAA golf championships in 1964. During his pro career, he won eight tournaments on the PGA tour and 20 on the senior's tour.

Jim Colbert receives a tip from coach Mickey Evans during the preparation for a short putt while the 1961 squad watches. Colbert also played on the football team for one year.

Ahead of the game

Colbert helps rebuild K-State golf program

The "Wildcat Archives" series will take a look back at a different K-Stater every week who was part of an important time in Wildcat sports history.

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Despite growing up in Kansas and becoming one of the nation's top collegiate golfers while at K-State, there was a time when Jim Colbert didn't have much of a reason to linger in Manhattan.

He would come back every year to compete in a golf tournament to support his old team, but other than that, he admits he was a bit detached from K-State. Colbert, who went pro in 1965, was busy competing in tournaments on the PGA tour and later the senior's tour.

But then in 1989, someone arrived in Manhattan who sparked Colbert's interest. Bill Snyder took over the K-State football program and had the Wildcats headed to bowl games on a yearly basis by the early 1990s.

Colbert, who also played one season with the K-State football team, was stunned by Snyder's progress. During Colbert's college days, the Wildcats' best season was a 3-7 campaign in 1964.

"We were fodder," said Colbert, who played quarterback and defensive back for a season before quitting because of a separated right shoulder. "We only played four home games, because we were the team that went on the road, and they paid us to come get our ass kicked. In those days they might pay you $100...$125,000 to get beat. Now we're just the other way. We pay the other guys."

He said the resurrection of the football team gave the K-State community something to take pride in. Colbert went from hardly coming back to Manhattan at all to rarely missing a football game.

Colbert saw the progress that could be made for collegiate athletics with the support of the university's administration. He credits President Jon Wefald, who was appointed in 1986, and members of his administration like Bob Krause, vice president for institutional advancement, for finding funds to support the football program when many people believed there were none.

"Before Bill Snyder, before we won any football games, everybody said Kansas State was broke," Colbert said. "KU had all the money. It turns out we weren't broke at all."

But football wasn't the only squad that fell on hard times. The same golf team that Colbert competed on when he placed second nationally in 1964 also struggled.

Colbert had made a career out of golf, winning eight PGA tournaments before capturing 20 tournament titles on the senior tour. While coming back for all those football games, he often bumped into Krause and former Department of Intercollegiate Athletic Director Ernie Barrett.

By 1994, Barrett and Krause had convinced Colbert to spearhead the funding for a new course for K-State's golf teams, thinking if improved facilities and support could work for football, then it could work for golf.

"You get Ernie Barrett and Krause on you, and they're going to get in your pocket," Colbert said.

After a couple failed attempts to locate a spot, Colbert finally found a piece of land suitable for a world-class golf course. The property belonged to Kansas rancher Jack Vanier, who had the football complex named after him for his contributions to the program. Originally Vanier didn't want to sell the land, but Colbert and K-State were able to negotiate the deal that obtained the 305 acre plot located

See COLBERT, Page 8

Alesana will be just fine

There's a saying that goes something like this: "It doesn't matter how many good things you do in a row, most people will only remember you for the one bad thing you did."

NICK DUNN

It seems to translate well to all areas of life. After K-State's 23-13 loss at Auburn, I think it's safe to assume the saying applies to football, too. There's a certain play from that game that's been running through people's minds for a few days now.

Trailing 16-13, K-State was nearing midfield with less than two minutes remaining. The Auburn faithful were screaming, defensive coordinator Will Muschamp was sending the house every play and quarterback Josh Freeman dropped back to pass for the 54th time. But Freeman didn't get an opportunity to attempt No. 54 on that play.

Auburn's No. 54 had something else in mind. Quentin Groves - Auburn's All-America candidate - who looks like he was pulled straight from Under Armour's "Click-Clack" commercials - tore around left tackle Alesana Alesana and nailed Freeman's blind side, causing a fumble. Touchdown Auburn. Game over.

Since then, there's been much criticism about Alesana and his ability to anchor the left side of the line. Pair that with his four false-start penalties, and it's clear the big Samoan was not on top of his game.

But the questions remain: Was Alesana really to blame? Were there too many expectations heaped on his shoulders heading into the season?

The answer to the former, obviously, is yes. You can't pin the collapse on one player, but of course Alesana is partly to blame for the loss. Everyone is. Had he been able to stay in front of Groves late in the game, there might have been an entirely different outcome.

So what does that mean for the rest of the season? Alesana is going to be just fine. Somewhere along the way it was forgotten that Alesana was a large part of why K-State was in the lead in the first place.

Freeman threw 57 passes, more than any Wildcat quarterback had thrown in 35 years, yet he was sacked only twice. For the majority of the game, Alesana was matched up against someone coach Ron Prince said was equal to NFL stars Shawne Merriman, Julius Peppers and Mario Williams. Granted, that was probably coach-speak, but you get the point. Groves is likely a first-round pick next year if he stays healthy.

And judging his overall performance, Alesana held his own. In his first Division-I game, in front of a crowd monumentally larger than anything he's ever played in front of before, against a probable All-American, he held his own.

Yes, the final minutes were bad. Alesana was clearly over-matched. But that was when the crowd was loudest, and the players could barely hear the play in the huddle, let alone the snap count. He was going completely off movement.

Junior-college players usually take a few weeks to adjust to the increase in competition. For the most part, I was impressed with Alesana in his first game. As long as he keeps his confidence up, he should be solid in the games that really matter.

And hopefully he can make fans forget about that one bad play.

Norwood enters not-guilty plea at 1st court appearance

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State tight end Rashaad Norwood made his first appearance in Riley County District Court Wednesday, pleading not guilty to charges stemming from his Aug. 19 arrests.

A district court spokeswoman said Norwood's next court appearance is scheduled for Sept. 17.

Coach Ron Prince suspended Norwood indefinitely following the arrests, saying the tight end's status would be reassessed once the judicial process had run its course.

At this point, it is uncertain when that might be. No trial date has been set, and the judge's schedule will dictate when Norwood's case is tried, Riley County Attorney Barry Wilkerson said.

"It has to go to trial within the next six months unless he or his attorney waives the right to a speedy trial," Wilkerson said.

"(The schedule) is fairly full through December, but that doesn't mean it couldn't happen sooner."

Norwood was arrested on charges of domestic battery, criminal damage to property, criminal trespassing and obstruction of the legal process.

The first arrest came after he allegedly forced his way into the apartment of a female acquaintance, using a chair to break a sliding glass door. Once inside the apartment, Norwood broke into a locked bedroom and forced the female acquaintance to the bed, police said.

Norwood was apprehended after a foot chase and later released on bail. The second arrest came when police found Norwood at the female acquaintance's apartment later that morning.

As expected, Norwood did not play in K-State's season opener at Auburn. Before the game, Prince provided no update on the senior tight end's status but indicated he was still practicing with the team.

Norwood

"The definition of what suspended is primarily focuses on playing in the games, but going home and playing video games every day doesn't sound like a suspension to me," Prince said. "So sometimes we try to do things to gain their attention and reinforce why good behavior is good and why bad behavior is not good."

K-State's Korobkova named Big 12 Player of the Week

STAFF REPORTS

K-State junior Nataly Korobkova earned the Big 12 Offensive Player of the Week award for her performance at the Hawaiian Airlines Wahine Classic.

In 11 tournament games, the junior from Krasnoyarsk, Russia, tallied 61 kills on a .308 hitting percentage.

She knocked down 24 kills and seven block assists during K-State's 3-1 loss against No. 16 Hawaii.

On Saturday, Korobkova aided in the Wildcats' sweep of Louisville with 15 kills on .500 attacking and added two service aces.

During the final match in Hawaii, Korobkova put up a match-high 22 kills and a career-high four service aces in the 3-1 loss to No. 5 UCLA.

The Player of the Week honor is Korobkova's first.

The 6-foot-3 outside hitter also was named to the Wahine Classic all-tournament team, her second all-tournament selection of the season. She earned most-valuable-player honors at the Shockers Volleyball Classic, K-State's first tournament of the season.

Korobkova

For the season, Korobkova ranks second in the Big 12 in kills per game at 5.04.

WILDCATS MOVE UP

K-State was ranked 22nd in the latest American Volleyball Coaches Association Top 25 poll, up three spots from last week. The Wildcats moved up in the rankings despite falling to No. 16 Hawaii and No. 5 UCLA in Hawaii.

Big 12 selects new commissioner

Dan Beebe was hired as Big 12 Conference commissioner Wednesday nearly two months after taking the job in an interim role.

Beebe, a former Ohio Valley Conference commissioner, had acted as commissioner since July. Kevin Weiberg held the post for nine years but left to take a job with the Big Ten Network.

Beebe, who had been the Big 12's chief operating officer since 2003, agreed to a five-year contract.

"I will bring my experience as a conference leader ... in taking the Big 12 to the next level of success as from a competitive and financial standpoint," Beebe said.

Beebe spent the last four years as the Big 12's senior associate commissioner. He served 14 years running the Ohio Valley Conference.

Beebe began his career in college athletics in 1982 as an NCAA enforcement representative. Following a one-year stint as assistant director of athletics at Wichita State, he returned to the NCAA in 1987. He lettered in football at Cal Poly Pomona.

northwest of Manhattan.

After Colbert himself made a substantial donation, several of his friends followed suit and joined the Colbert Hills Founders Club by donating at least $100,000. Colbert said the Founders Club, which even includes Snyder, has more than 100 founders.

Because of the contributions, Colbert Hills opened in May 2000.

"The K-Staters have really come together and helped us out here. Right now we've got a drive to do the clubhouse," Colbert said. "We've got some people doing that, and it looks like we're gonna get that done."

The Sept. 5 edition of Golf Digest ranked Colbert Hills the 42nd toughest course in the United States. Colbert, who now has a villa overlooking the ninth and 18th greens on the course, said he feels the facilities have been crucial in turning around the K-State golf teams.

"We've got two good coaches here," Colbert said. "We've got financial support for the program and a world-class facility. They just keep getting better and better."

"We've got the men and the women both in the top 30 in most years, and before we couldn't get in the top 130. They're making big improvements."

MCCALL AREA DEVELOPMENT

Although the McCall area development is a completely different project from the downtown redevelopment, speculation as to which restaurants are being opened has been equally as great. Rumors that the International House of Pancakes is backing out and that an Olive Garden or Red Lobster will take its place are simply not true, Fehr said. There has never been any negotiation about either of those restaurants and the IHOP is about 80 percent finished.

The other restaurants to be built in the McCall area include a Pizza Hut and Taco Bell, and a Wendy's already is in place. Fehr said the Taco Bell is a relocation of the company that owned the now demolished Long John Silvers on Fourth Street. The owners had other options of franchises and decided to reopen as a Taco Bell.

Manhattan building official Brad Claussen said it will be hard to tell when the Pizza Hut, IHOP and Taco Bell will open.

Each restaurant has been contracted by a different construction company, Claussen said, so the final date is up to whomever works the fastest.

But for now, he said the Pizza Hut is getting close, the Taco Bell just went through its framing inspection Friday - which means the interior is left to be finished - and the IHOP is somewhere in the middle.

Heather Wise, senior in architecture and product design, said she is pleased to see some more fast food places going in closer to campus, especially the Taco Bell since its other location is on the opposite side of town.

It is impossible to tell right now what effect the redevelopment projects will have on the city.

"Everybody is hoping it's going to be a positive one - especially economically," said City of that right can itself be used against a defendant," Johnson said.

The third point Johnson makes is hearsay evidence.

Fairchild permitted statements about conversations Murray had with Ross before she died. The conversations usually dealt with her relationship with Murray.

The fourth and final factor in appealing the conviction is the first trial was based on insufficient evidence, Johnson said.

NBC Action News quoted Wilson saying that the evidence is circumstantial but also very overwhelming.

"Murray gave different stories about where he was the day Ross was killed and had conducted Internet searches on how to commit murder," prosecutors said in the NBC Action News report.

The Lawrence-Journal World Web site also said Murray was a suspect because of Internet searches traced to his office computer. Phrases including "the best way to murder someone" to "extradition and United States" were some of the key phrases Murray searched for a month prior to Ross' death.

"Murray's explanation for the searches is that he was considering moving to California and writing for crime-scene TV shows if his ex-wife took the couple's daughter there to live with her new love interest," according to a Lawrence Journal-World report. Nowhere in the search did investigators find anything about TV shows.

John Fliter, associate professor of political science, said the defense lawyers said there were many claims of hearsay evidence, and that he did not get his rights.

"These types of cases are difficult to win, but it could be in his favor," Fliter said. "We'll just have to see."

PROUD gives 2 awards

By Rachel Dorsey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Opportunity Awards are being given through funds raised in last spring's K-State PROUD campaign: Students Helping Students.

The two types of Student Opportunity Awards are the K-State Proud Award and the Hero Award, said Emily Besler, internal campaign coordinator and senior in political science.

The K-State Hero Award recognizes students who go above and beyond. Each Hero Award is $500 and is awarded through a nomination and selection process.

The second type of award, the K-State PROUD Award, helps students experiencing unexpected financial crisis make ends meet, Besler said.

The Student Opportunity Awards Committee reviews applications for the K-State PROUD Award and allocates an amount based on indicated need, said Ben Tryon, vice president of allocations for the KSU Student Foundation and senior in chemical engineering.

The PROUD campaign funds both awards and is the first all-university campaign of its kind. The campaign is the student contribution to the KSU Foundation's Changing Lives Campaign. Students developed the PROUD campaign to include all aspects of the university in the larger-scale campaign, Besler said.

By the end of the final student campaign event in February — Black-Out Bramlage — the KSU Student Foundation announced students and alumni had raised $62,000 through T-shirt sales and donations.

Besler said alumni inspired by the students' gifts continued to contribute to the campaign even after the last event, helping bring the total to more than $73,000.

The application process for the K-State Hero Award will begin in October. Five awards will be granted to students in the fall, along with five awards in the spring. Applications are available on KSU Student Foundation Web site, www.found.ksu.edu/studentfoundation.

The committees for allocating awards are groups of K-State students who expressed interest in becoming more involved during last year's campaign, Tryon said.

"Committees are students from across campus," he said. "We want as much diversity on our committees in order to represent the entire student body."

Besler said events for the second installment of the campaign are scheduled for basketball season and will resemble last year's events.

She said all interested students are invited to get involved in the planning and management of the next K-State PROUD campaign.

Student volunteers can get involved at many levels, Tryon said. Committees have positions open, and other volunteer opportunities are available.

"We had about 200 campus volunteers last year that played an integral role in spreading the word on campus," Tryon said. "We will probably have the same type of group this year."

Lauren Stum, sophomore in chemical engineering and art, said she bought a T-shirt last year to help K-State students.

"K-State PROUD is an easy way to help your fellow students," Stum said. "It's a way to help them pursue the goals that they want to pursue and fulfill their dreams."

Besler said she was pleased students who otherwise could not continue their education have the opportunity to do so.

"Students should be very proud of all the work they put in last year," Besler said. "We are really making a difference in students' lives even though we can't see it. We should be very proud of the accomplishments."

Sister of murdered teen faces grief, raises awareness

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Lindsey Smith is not afraid to talk about it now. She has a story to tell.

Smith, a senior in history, experienced first-hand one of the most horrific and nationally-published events of the summer. Her sister, Kelsey, was abducted just 10 minutes from her home in Overland Park, Kan., and murdered.

THE WORST FEELING IN THE WORLD

Lindsey and Kelsey spent much of Saturday, June 2 at Old Shawnee Days with their family. After that, Kelsey attended a graduation party and traveled to the ominous Target on 97th and Quivira streets in Overland Park, Kan. Kelsey was to meet her boyfriend, John, at about 7:30 p.m. to celebrate their six-month anniversary. She never arrived.

Later that night, the Smith family found Kelsey's car at the Oak Park Mall. At this point, Lindsey said she and her family started "freaking out."

The next day, Lindsey said the case started appearing in the news, and June 4 she said her family granted close to 30 interviews just to get the word of Kelsey's abduction out to the public.

"We were on everything from local news to Nancy Grace to Gretna Van Susteren," Smith said. "We went national within two days of her missing."

Smith said family and friends also started to organize searches close to the Target where Kelsey went missing.

Eric Hillmer, a friend of Kelsey's, organized several of the local searches. He said he took the initiative to start the search when he heard a person say most people abducted are found within five miles of their abduction.

"So that just kind of sparked the idea of, 'Why don't we just keep it close to home and search that area where we're most able to find her?'" Hillmer said.

Hillmer, junior in business administration, said the searchers made maps and plotted out each individual grid within five miles for different groups to explore. On June 4, Hillmer said several friends and family members helped, but not much of the map was covered.

"The more we started looking at that, the more impossible it seemed because it's such a huge area really," Hillmer said.

The Smith family then made a blessed plea for volunteers to help with the search. It worked. Hillmer said more than 400 people came the next day to help.

Many of the volunteers did not even know Kelsey, Lindsey said.

"Half of the people didn't even know her or didn't know who she was, but they related to her on some way because she was involved in so many things," Lindsey said.

sey said.

She said people who did not know Kelsey would approach her family and say their child died two years ago, or their child was in marching band or a musical in high school, and they wanted to help.

Kelsey's body was found June 6 in south Jackson County, Mo., about 20 miles from the Target.

Lindsey said she and her older sister learned of the discovery that evening from their parents.

She said she does not remember her reaction to the news and was told she screamed and had to be carried into the house. She said the next few days were very rough.

"I emotionally shut down," she said. "I didn't talk to anybody, I didn't look at anybody and I didn't want anybody to touch me. And when people tried to hug me I got really mad and wanted them to go away."

Pancake feed for K-State faculty, staff starts All-University Campaign

By Sarah Burford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Pancakes sizzled on the skillet as K-State faculty and staff members lined up to eat breakfast at Ahearn Field House on Thursday morning in support of the All-University Campaign.

More than 400 faculty and staff members attended the pancake feed, which started the All-University Campaign. The campaign is part of the Changing Lives Campaign, which started in July 2000 in response to decreased state funding for universities, according to the KSU Foundation Web site.

Gary Mortenson, All-University Campaign co-chair, said he hoped the pancake feed would pull the campus together as a community and show outside supporters that faculty members are passionate about the university.

"I think the faculty is intent on making sure the next generation has the same opportunities," said Mortenson, professor of music. "The stakes are pretty high."

The Changing Lives Campaign has raised more than $480 million, and its comprehensive goal is $500 million. The All-University Campaign portion ends Nov. 14, and the Changing Lives Campaign ends Dec. 31.

The All-University Campaign's success last year inspired the creation of K-State PROUD, which encouraged donations from students. The money that K-State PROUD raised went to two different student awards.

"We saw the passion that the faculty and staff had and wanted to tap into that passion for the university," said Molly Hamm, KSU Student Foundation member and junior in English and secondary education. "It's something we've really never tried before."

About 40 percent of K-State faculty and staff members have participated in the Changing Lives Campaign, with a total of more than $12.5 million, said Julie Lea, KSU Foundation vice president for communications and development services.

Mortenson said the interest that K-State faculty and staff members show plays an important role in raising financial support.

"If we're not in the business of taking the ball into our own hands and raising money, we're in trouble," he said.

All-University Campaign co-chairs include Mortenson; Gayle Doll, director of the Center on Aging; and Jennifer Owensby, accountant in the controller's office. They plan to visit faculty meetings in the next few weeks to distribute information packets about donations.

The departments that receive money from the campaign are allowed to use it at their own discretion, and Doll said it is one of the few funds that allow faculty members to use the money for needed materials.

Larry Scharmann, head of the Department of Secondary Education, said most of the donations for the department have gone to student scholarships.

"Most of the faculty are interested in seeing students get a break," Scharmann said.

Owensby summarized the campaign's purpose as an effort to help students.

"This whole thing is really in support of the students," she said. "That's central in the mind of everyone that donates."

SGA approves travel allocations

By Whitney Hodgins
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate approved an amendment to standardize travel allocations for student organizations at Student Governing Association's meeting Thursday.

Campus-wide organizations and college councils have $1,000 available for up to two travel allocation requests per year, according to the amendments approved by the Student Senate. The change was made to standardize allotment policies for on-campus groups and will save more than $10,000 to $20,000, said Bryan Cox, allocations community chair.

College councils, which are organizations in specific colleges, were allowed two travel requests for $1,000 each under the previous bill, while campus-wide organizations had to divide $1,000 between two travel requests. Standardizing the allocations prevents SGA from being sued by either party for biased funding, said Parliamentarian Cynthia Hoffman.

"The differences in statutes could lead to legal ramifications," she said. "While the amendment also saves SGA money, the bigger issue is the legal inconsistency. We don't want to restrict travel — we just don't have the money to allot that much."

If a 10-member college-wide organization or college council group requests the full amount of $1,000 to fund a trip, each student will receive $100. Groups also can choose to split the amount between two trips.

Cox said it is difficult for the senate to reject students' requests that are clearly important to their organizations, however SGA does not have enough money to satisfy everyone.

"It's hard to say no to requests for quality events," Cox said. "But we need to learn how to responsibly allocate without restricting valuable opportunities for the groups."

Also during the meeting, student body vice president Lydia Peele made a presentation on the Good Neighbors Program, a task force of K-State students and community members whose goal is to strengthen the bond between K-State and its surrounding neighborhoods.

The program will target 12 critical areas in Manhattan that generate more than the average number of nuisance violations.

As a way to start the program, the Good Neighbors Program will host a Call Hall ice cream social to encourage communication between neighborhoods and pride in K-State.

It is scheduled for Sept. 16 for 9th Street residents located between Thurston and Bertrand streets, Bluemont Avenue and Vattier Street, and on Laramie Street between Sunset Drive and Denison Avenue. A neighborhood clean-up day also will be in November.

"They are going to be great opportunities for students and community members to get to know each other," Peele said.

World Rabies Day features 5K race, local music, catered food, speakers

By Willow Williamson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The first-ever World Rabies Day will feature a 5K race, speakers, local music, food and fun — all to increase the awareness of rabies.

The event will be from noon to 4 p.m. Sept. 9 at Cico Park.

Kelli Smith, third-year student in veterinary medicine, said the event is in recognition of World Rabies Day, which is Sept. 8. Other veterinary schools around the nation will also celebrate the event.

"It's the very first World Rabies Day ever," Smith said. "It's a global event."

Activities at the festival include a 5K race, a children's octabounce, face-painting, games, Humane Society adoptions and on-site 15-minute massages from Body First, said Smith, who was in charge of organizing the children's events and recruiting the local bands.

Call Hall ice cream will be available, as well as catered food and live music — all in support of rabies prevention.

The 5K run is a certification course, said Chelsea Kunst, third-year student in veterinary medicine and chair of the race.

"It's not just a fun run," she said. "People are actually competing."

The top three male competitors and the top three female competitors all will receive trophies, Kunst said.

To participate in the race, runners can register online at www.active.com, or they can register at the park starting at 1 p.m. Sunday.

Fees are $20 for anyone 16 and older and $5 for anyone younger than 16. Participants will receive a free T-shirt.

Three bands will play during the event, Smith said. They include Liars of Local Interest, Fashionably Late and Red State Blues Band.

Speakers also will be present to raise awareness of rabies. Patricia Payne, professor of diagnostic medicine and pathobiology, will present on service dogs in the community and will bring her own service dog-in-training, Tinsel.

Dr. Erin Kennedy, who is on the rabies team at the Center for Disease Control, will speak on how to tell if one has been exposed to rabies and what to do if that occurs, Kunst said.

Also, Aaron Wright, Riley County police officer with the K-9 unit, will bring his police dog, Dino, and talk about his responsibilities.

Each year, 55,000 people around the world die from rabies, Smith said. Most of them are in Africa and Asia.

"Just around the community we want to raise awareness about how big rabies is around the world," Kunst said.

Rabies in humans is 100 percent preventable through immediate medical attention and through vaccination, she said, but many third-world countries do not have the money or the information to adequately protect people from rabies.

Smith said she hopes at least 200 people will come to the festival.

"What better way to get involved than with the first-ever World Rabies Day?" she said.

Lambda Chi Alpha was host to the event to raise money for the Flint Hills Bread Basket. The annual event raised money for the group by accepting canned-food donations and entry fees in hopes to raise more than $2,500.

Playing loud music from the bed of a pick-up truck, several Lambda Chis played tracks in an attempt to keep the mood light for the evening. The playlist was dominated by country music, and several girls danced near the truck.

The evening had many activities including a watermelon chariot race, a large-scale watermelon fight and watermelon bowling.

3rd-annual PetPoolooza event will feature various activities for pets, their owners

By Monica Castro
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Dogs can swim to their heart's content this weekend while their owners participate in various activities, including a dunk tank, a silent auction and a dog show.

The third-annual PetPoolooza, organized by the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department, will be from 1 to 4 p.m. Sunday at Cico Park Pool.

The event is for dogs and their owners, said Ashley Penner, recreation coordinator. The pool at Cico Park has been cleaned for the dogs to swim in.

"We have diluted and prepared the water for the dogs at the beginning of the week," she said. "We have also drained it a bit, so it is easy for the dogs to get in and out of the water."

Also at the festival will be an agility demonstration, sponsored by the Manhattan Kennel Club. The demonstration will include obstacle courses for competition dogs and other dogs to show off their style.

"We opened it up for people to try to get their dogs to do the course and get people involved," Penner said.

A Big Air Demonstration also will be performed by Elite Khaki, a famous competition dog.

It is an opportunity for pets and their owners to view other dogs running and jumping in demonstrations. Owners are encouraged to get their dogs to participate in the demonstration.

Local businesses have donated pet-related items for a silent auction for people to participate in.

All proceeds from the auction will go to the T. Russell Reitz Animal Shelter, Penner said.

Pets and their owners also will have the chance to take pictures with Willie the Wildcat.

"I thought it was neat that Willie is an animal, and it could be related to the event," Penner said.

Pet vendors will set up booths to sell pet-related items or provide information on services they can offer pets and their owners.

Admission to PetPoolooza is free, but donations will be accepted and all proceeds will go to the T. Russell Reitz Animal Shelter.

Penner said her goal for this year's event is to raise more than $3,000.

Highway to hell

Bush administration making United States vulnerable by making trade with Mexico too easy

As the primaries draw nearer, Republicans and Democrats continue to recite the same rehearsed answers to questions presented. Republican presidential candidates have repeated time after time the United States should secure the southern border, but actions speak louder than words.

BRETT KING

When a president takes his oath before the citizens of the United States, he swears to "protect, preserve and defend the Constitution of the United States." His oath requires him to uphold the sovereignty of the United States and defend this country from threats, both foreign and domestic.

Behind the backs of U.S. citizens, President Bush has extended provisions of the North American Free Trade Agreement to allow trucks that are shipping goods from Mexico to enter the United States.

Reuters reported Saturday, Sept. 1, that the Bush administration is in the final stages of allowing authorization for Mexican trucks to transport goods in the United States without having to stop and transfer loads to U.S. trucks. This will allow less time for these goods to be checked for safety and the trucks for contraband.

Allowing Mexican trucks to bring imports to the U.S. is the first step leading to the creation of a NAFTA superhighway, which would connect the countries to NAFTA.

Presidential candidate Rep. Ron Paul (R-TX), said in a press release on Oct. 30, 2006, the idea behind the NAFTA superhighway comes from the government organization Security and Prosperity Partnership of North America.

According to Paul's release, the SPP's superhighway, "...would connect Mexico, the United States and Canada, cutting a wide swath through the middle of Texas and up through Kansas City. Offshoots would connect the main artery to the West Coast, Florida, and the Northeast. Proponents envision a 10-lane colossus the width of several football fields, with freight and rail lines, fiber-optic cable lines, and oil and natural gas pipelines running alongside."

Worldnetdaily.com reported Aug. 28, while the plan for the NAFTA superhighway is still in planning stages, trucks from Mexico will use Interstates 10 and 35 to transport goods through the country.

Besides the amount of land the government would need to steal from its citizens through eminent domain, the real danger comes from Mexico's foreign-trading partners.

Two of Mexico's coastal ports, Manzanillo and Lazaro Cardenas, have become direct trade routes between China and Mexico, according to worldnetdaily.com.

Once imports are unloaded from Chinese ships and placed on Mexican trucks, they will be able to precede all the ways to the central United States without being unloaded once.

Recent news on Chinese exports has demonstrated the lack of standards put into their products.

In August 2007, Mattel was forced to recall more than 19 million toys because of the lead-based paint with which many of them were made. Where were those toys made? China. Not even the European Union trusts goods from China. According to BBC News on Sept. 5, "half of all goods withdrawn in 2006 were Chinese."

Those goods withdrawn from the EU were deemed unsafe because of sharp components in children's toys, faulty insulated wires near fuel tanks in motorbikes and automobiles, high lead concentration in paint, and cosmetics contaminated with fungus.

These actions have created an open door and a free pass for a potential threat from foreign sources, whether it be person, product or weapon. President Bush and his administration have allowed for one of the greatest threats to our national security just to appease our neighbors to the south.

Marijuana ban is alcohol prohibition of this generation

Aug. 2 marked the 70th anniversary of the start of one of the great social experiments in American history. Sadly, the experiment has failed miserably and should have ended years ago.

The first national anti-marijuana law, the Marijuana Tax Act, was signed into law by President Franklin D. Roosevelt on Aug. 2, 1937.

Though disguised as a tax, the law functioned as the first federal ban on the possession and cultivation of marijuana. The ban continues in various forms to this day.

Now, 70 years later, we can see this program has not prevented the use of marijuana in the United States.

Marijuana use increased after the drug was banned. In 1937, marijuana use was rare in the United States because marijuana virtually was unknown to many parts of the country, according to a study conducted at the University of California, San Francisco.

The federal government has estimated in the pre-prohibition era, about 1.2 percent of the population had tried marijuana by age 35. In recent decades, figures show the range to consistently hover at 40 to 50 percent, according to the National Institute on Drug Abuse.

Marijuana is now our nation's largest cash crop by a whopping margin. According to Americans for Safe Access, an organization based in Oakland, Calif., the 2006 U.S. marijuana crop was valued at $35.8 billion by street pricing, exceeding the value of corn ($23.3 billion) and wheat ($7.45 billion) combined.

Opponents of the drug will argue marijuana would be more widely used if legalized.

In the Netherlands, adults are allowed to possess and purchase small amounts of marijuana from regulated businesses. Rates of marijuana use are lower there than in the United States.

According to figures collected from both the U.S. Department of Justice and the Netherlands Ministry of Health in 2005, 17.1 percent of Netherlands residents age 12 and older had tried marijuana, compared to 40.1 percent in the United States.

Instead of stopping Americans from using marijuana, prohibition of this herb simply has handed a lucrative market to criminals. With legiti-mate businesses banned from producing or selling a popular product, gangsters stepped in to fill the void.

With prohibition keeping the price high, there always will be new growers ready to replace each one who is busted.

There has been little progress made for the tens of billions of dollars spent seizing marijuana plants and arresting users at the rate of nearly 800,000 per year.

These costs are even more tragic when considering the scientific experts who consistently report marijuana is a far safer drug than alcohol or tobacco - it is less addictive, much less toxic and is less likely to induce aggression or violence. These results were found in a study by Dr. Andrew Weil and Dr. Norman Zinberg in a Dec. 13, 1968, issue of "Science."

The Drug Enforcement Agency no longer allows the possession of marijuana for research purposes, thus newer studies have not been conducted.

It's time to learn from our nation's disastrous attempt to ban alcohol. Instead of the futurity and destruction of prohibition, let's put marijuana under a common-sense system of taxation and regulation, just like alcohol and tobacco.

TO THE POINT

Individuals should pay own fee

Studying abroad is a wonderful experience for students to learn about another culture as well as more about themselves. The education we receive while attending college stems not only from what we learn in the classroom but from the experiences in which we take part.

K-State has a wonderful study-abroad office that allows students to increase their marketability for future jobs.

The elimination of the $50 study-abroad application fee could be an excellent opportunity for students to reduce some costs associated with studying abroad. However, with the total costs, $50 saved only eliminates a small percentage.

The one-time transfer of $30,000 from the K-State budget office to the study-abroad office barely scratches the surface in covering the application fees for study-abroad students.

The Kansas Board of Regents has set a lofty goal to have one-fourth of all students studying abroad. With a student enrollment estimated at 23,000, it would cost $287,500 in application fees for one-fourth of our student body to participate.

We have yet to know how the application fee will be paid once the allocation as has run dry.

When money runs low, we as students are usually forced to shoulder the costs by means of an increase in student activity fees or a tuition increase.

In the game of dollars and cents, it does not make sense for those not participating in the program to shoulder the costs.

with faculty and other students to determine the need for a Dead Week policy on campus. If necessary, the committee will recommend policies and an implementation plan to Student Senate and Faculty Senate.

FINANCIAL PLANNING CENTER COMMITTEE

This committee will work to incorporate a financial planning center on campus that will allow students to receive free financial planning advice. The focus of this committee will be to determine students' needs, research potential providers and recommend to Student Senate and the University Administration a corporation to sponsor this office on campus.

A list of the university-wide committees is on the application, which are online at www.ksu.edu/sga, on the right-hand side of the main page, or in the Office of Student Activities and Services. Applications should be returned to OSAS or e-mailed to mwagner@ksu.edu.

Committee positions will be filled by application and on a first-come, first-served basis, as qualifications are met.

Auburn alumnus applauds Wildcat effort

Editor,

I am an Auburn alumnus and supporter of my university, and I would like to say a few words to your team, coaches and fans.

First of all, you should be very proud of your football team. They completely outplayed our team and our coaches were outcoached. You have some very talented athletes that showed team spirit, tremendous heart and sportsmanship.

As for your fans, they were wonderful to have on our campus. Each person I met was very friendly and courteous. I hope we were gracious to them as well.

Your team and fans represented your fine university well.

I hope the rest of your season goes in your favor.

Fans invade Poyntz Avenue for rally

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Poyntz Avenue shut down for a few hours last night and was invaded by booths, bands and a free dunk tank.

Purple Power Play on Poyntz is an annual event aimed to excite the Manhattan community for the upcoming athletic and academic year.

The event occurs every year on Poyntz on the first Thursday and Friday before the first home football game.

A variety of area businesses, restaurants and clubs promoted themselves and educated those walking by about what they are all about.

Applebee's, Harry's Up-town and other dining establishments sold food and refreshments to hot and hungry pedestrians.

Competing with the flow of consumers visiting the food-related booths, several tables offered popcorn to lure the curious attendees.

Amanda Bailiff, sophomore in open option, went to the event and ate some of the snacks.

"My favorite thing about tonight is this hot, buttery popcorn," she said.

Bailiff was with two friends who attended the Watermelon Bust down the street.

The two-day event was for both young and old in the K-State community. The Manhattan Rebels, a local youth soccer team, had an interesting way to raise money for their team.

Caroline Ballard, a Manhattan Rebels team member, collected money from those willing to lend their face as a canvas.

Emma Samenus, another Manhattan Rebels team member, also honed her face-painting skills.

"The coolest thing I painted was a mermaid," Samenus said.

The team members around Samenus were quick to testify to the mermaid, which was a big hit around the group.

The U.S. Cellular JumboTron sat on the east end of Poyntz to display the action on stage to those further down the street unable to see the action up close.

Gymnastics Plus students performed on the stage for the main event of the evening. The gymnasts performed in front of a small crowd that included Bill Snyder, who was there to see his granddaughter tumble.

While the main event kicked-off tonight, there is still more in store for tomorrow.

"The Intrust Bank fireworks display is one of the largest and most anticipated events, but we still have Coach Prince and the football team coming out," said Lisa Rockley, president for Purple Power Play on Poyntz.

Rockley went on to say the men's and women's basketball teams also will make an appearance tomorrow night.

WOMEN'S GOLF | SEASON PREVIEW

The sky is the limit

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

Senior Michelle Regan tees off from the 11th hole during practice Wednesday at Colbert Hills. Regan is one of three seniors returning from a team that came within four strokes of the best finish in school history. K-State will open its fall season in Lincoln, Neb., for the Chip-N-Club Invitational beginning Monday.

Women's golf team looks to establish consistency, improve Big 12 standing

By Joel Jellison
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coach Kristi Knight said inconsistency was the biggest issue for the K-State women's golf team last season, and it led to a seventh place finish at the Big 12 Championship.

Even so, the Wildcats were just four strokes away from fourth place at the conference championship, which would have been the best finish in school history.

"Last year we were pretty inconsistent," Knight said. "We finished seventh at the Big 12 Championship, four shots out of fourth. We were in position to have a really nice finish — fourth would have been the best in team history."

The players' performance in practice, especially the seniors', has Knight excited about the new season.

"This year's team I'm really looking forward to because I really like the team chemistry," Knight said. "I like the energy I see at practice. The seniors played really well in the qualifying tournament, and that's important. Obviously we need good play out of everyone, but I think it's really important when the seniors step out at the beginning of the season and play well, because I think it helps pull everyone along."

The Wildcats return three players who participated in last season's Big 12 Championship — sophomore Abbi Sunner and seniors Michelle Regan and Hailey Mireles.

Senior Kali Quick also will return after missing most of the spring due to illness.

"Kali is back healthy," Knight said. "Kali missed most of last spring. She only got to play in the first two tournaments. She missed most of the spring with mono, so she wasn't in the lineup at Big 12."

With the returning talent, Knight said she feels like the team is better than it was a year ago.

"Last year we were just very up and down," Knight said. "We had some nice rounds, we had some nice tournaments — we just weren't able to put it together on a consistent enough basis. These players have the ability to face adversity and overcome."

The members of the team competed in several tournaments during the summer, all seeing various levels of success while gaining experience.

"Regan qualified again for the U.S. Amateur, Kali qualified for the Pub Links in June, and Abbi played in a couple of events and did well," Knight said.

The Wildcats recently completed their qualifying tournaments to determine the five golfers who will compete at the Chip-N-Club Invitational Monday and Tuesday in Lincoln, Neb.

After spending the summer working on a new swing, Mireles won the qualifying tournament and the top spot on the team while Quick, Regan, Sunner and junior Krista Nelson rounded out the group.

Sophomore Morgan Moon will travel with the team to compete as an individual.

Knight said she was impressed by the at-

Creativity can trump raw talent

We've got questions.
Ron Prince has answers.

No matter what qualm fans might have about the program, just ask coach Prince. He'll be able to provide some sort of answer for them. He is the Radio Shack of college football coaches.

Except when it comes to play-calling, that is.

Prince likes to keep fans and opponents guessing with a vast array of inventive formations and trick plays. And ultimately, that's what he'll need to make K-State a winner in the Big 12 Conference.

Check the Wildcat roster. K-State, which recruits heavily from the state of Kansas, has only 11 players from the football-dominant state of Texas.

Two of the most notable K-State players are from Kansas: wide receiver Jordy Nelson, from Riley, and defensive end Ian Campbell, from Cimarron.

It's not that the Wildcats don't have talent — they just don't have as much as teams with larger recruiting bases.

Wins have to come from somewhere. Teams with less talent have to compensate in other areas. One obvious area is coaching and play-calling. Work with what you have.

That's exactly what Prince did in two notable wins last season.

When Oklahoma State came to visit Oct. 7, K-State was able to make up a 10-point deficit in three minutes. Josh Freeman had a breakout game that solidified his starter status, and Marcus Watts not only blocked a punt, but he intercepted a ball in the end zone as time expired to end any chance of a Cowboy comeback.

Then, when K-State was host to Texas on Nov. 11, it seemed like the team and the coaching staff were working in unison.

Prince showed every ounce of coaching ability he had in that game — the game where he pulled out all the stops. He even allowed running back Leon Patton to show off his quarterback abilities as Patton threw a touchdown pass to Cedric Wilson.

While talent is very important, being able to mix up the offense and throw opponents for a loop should also be a key to victory. Creative play-calling keeps opponents on their toes.

Sure, running and passing are important. But for K-State to win in the Big 12, Prince must keep the "bold and daring" persona he had all of last season and use it in not only his play-calling, but in his personnel choices.

If he does, he'll keep fans and opponents guessing. And that's what it might take for K-State to return to dominance in the Big 12.

K-State runners ready to renew rivalry with Jayhawks

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When looking at the team results from the last season's dual against the KU cross country team, it might not look like K-State did much against the Jayhawks.

But from an individual standpoint, K-State's Liliani Mendez and Lindsay Pierson took first and second in the women's, while the highest-placing male runner was Colin Swaney.

"I thought we did what we could do last year," coach Michael Smith said. "In the women, we have more depth and more talent. We return all of the women from a year ago and have added six more. We have a better chance to be more competitive."

"In the men, we're not as deep. Our competition at KU is also not the same team they were a year ago."

K-State will be host to the dual this year, with the women's race at 6:45 tonight and the men following at 7:15. Both races will be at Warner Park.

"We're going to find out if we've taken any steps forward as a team," Smith said. "It's fun to do a scored meet, especially against our rivals at the University of Kansas."

There's more than just the rivalry driving senior Morgan Bonds. Bonds, who will be running against younger sister Lauren this weekend, said the fact that K-State has never beat KU in cross country is another motivator.

"I'm excited that I get to open my first race of the season in Manhattan," Bonds said. "I think because it's KU, it's important for this university in any sport. We're going head-to-head with them, and

No. 22 Wildcats return home for Varney's Invitational

By Jonathan Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nataly Korobkova, pre-season Big 12 Conference Newcomer of the Year, continues to prove her worth to K-State.

Korobkova recently was named the Big 12 Offensive Player of the Week and will lead the No. 22 Wildcats into action today at the Varney's Invitational at Ahearn Field House.

K-State will face Arkansas at noon today. The Lady Razorbacks (6-1) have won six-straight matches heading into today's action, but their winning streak has not landed them in the top 25. They received 24 votes in the latest poll.

K-State coach Suzie Fritz said the No. 22 ranking is not important to her at this point in the season — she is looking for composure from her team.

"Right now I just want to play well," Fritz said. "I want to stay sharp, and I want to stay focused from the start to finish of a match."

The Wildcats' second match of the day is scheduled for 7:30 p.m. against the Northern Iowa Cougars.

The Cougars (3-3) recently were swept by No. 10 Wisconsin and No. 15 BYU.

Pesno State (1-5) will be the last team to challenge the Wildcats this weekend, with play scheduled for 1 p.m. Saturday. The Bulldogs' only victory of the season came against UC Davis.

K-State is 5-1 all-time in the Varney's Invitational.

ESPNU to air Wichita East game

STAFF REPORT

K-State fans have seen the YouTube.com clips and the highlight videos. Now, they'll get a chance to watch Kansas prep stars Arthur and Bryce Brown play on live TV.

The Browns' Wichita East team will face Dodge City High in tonight's Old Spice High School Classic, which airs at 7 p.m. on ESPNU.

The game should draw healthy ratings in Manhattan, where fans hope they will see a glimpse of K-

State's football future.

Arthur Brown was rated the 16th-best prep prospect in the class of 2008 by Rivals.com. The 6-foot-1 middle linebacker has offers from schools across the country, including Alabama, Florida, Southern California, and of course, K-State.

Bryce Brown plays running back for Wichita East and is regarded as one of the top prospects in the nation for the class of 2009. He scored six touchdowns in East's 46-2 win over Wichita North last week.

AP poll accepts lower divisions

After pulling off one of the greatest upsets in college football history, Appalachian State is still shaking things up.

The Associated Press said Thursday that lower-division schools — that means you, Mountaineers — are now eligible for its 71-year-old poll.

Several AP voters expressed interest in putting Appalachian State on their ballots after a shocking 34-32 upset at then-No. 5 Michigan last weekend.

K-State architecture students redesign downtown Wichita

By Ashley Frey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Colorful details of park, fountain and landscape designs for the future of Wichita line the walls of the Chang Gallery in Seaton Hall.

The projects belong to K-State architecture students who spent the summer addressing issues and studying downtown Wichita to develop designs for the city. Thirty students did the summer work as part of the K-State College of Architecture, Planning and Design's summer community planning and design studio program.

Stephanie Rolley, professor of landscape architecture and regional and community planning, said the program consisted of two classes a studio and a seminar—and three class trips to Wichita.

Rolley and Tony Barnes, professor of landscape architecture and regional and community planning, were the professors for the program.

She said the program was a great experience for the students.

"The people (in Wichita) were very helpful," Rolley said. "The students did tremendous work and expanded their own thinking."

Rolley said the students were able to choose their own aspects of the downtown area to study and to develop ideas for city improvements.

"The important thing about this summer is the difference in scale," Rolley said. "The students looked at different ranges of street scape. They had really broad areas and expanded outside that."

The students' designs were on display at the art gallery in Wichita in July and are now on display at the Chang Gallery until Sept. 14.

Anthony Fox, graduate student in landscape architecture, chose to do his project on the Arkansas River and expand his ideas outside downtown Wichita. He chose a specific three-mile area along the river to put a park district, tennis courts and numerous other options for leisure along the linear spread.

"I chose this to connect people and the city as gas increases," Fox said. "This way, they could ride their bikes to work. It is a nice way for people to get around."

Andy Meessmann, graduate student in landscape architecture, said he chose to redesign the entire downtown area to connect each end of downtown with a central core and park area.

At the conclusion of the studio, the students met with city officials and developers to discuss their ideas for potential future use. Rolley said the group received positive feedback, and residents were enthusiastic about the students' work.

"I think they will take bits and pieces of the designs," Meessmann said. "I think they like the youngblood design. (The officials) can see what other possibilities are out there."

Rolley said Wichita was chosen as the site for the summer studio because an artist from the Wichita area soon will start with the architecture department.

"It was a wonderful opportunity to envision what the people of Wichita could have," Fox said. "I hope the city takes our ideas and utilizes them."

K-State grads fill teaching vacancies

By April Newby
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's teaching department is working to help eliminate the teacher shortage in Kansas.

Kansas is facing the highest number of teacher vacancies in the state's history—1,144 before this school year, said Kansas Commissioner of Education in an Aug. 22 Associated Press report. The greatest shortages were for special education, science, math and fine-arts educators.

This issue is the result of several factors, Posny said. Thirty-six percent of the teachers in Kansas will be eligible to retire within the next five years, she said.

There are about 25 percent less students entering teaching fields, she said. This, paired with low pay and few benefits, creates a huge issue.

"If nothing is done, the problem will only be exacerbated," Posny said.

For the past 25 years, K-State's College of Education has had a steadily increasing enrollment and graduation rate, said Michael Holen, dean of education.

About 400 undergraduate students and 250 graduate students graduate from the College of Education each year. In addition, the retention rate is very high—more than 90 percent of students who begin in the education program graduate in it, Holen said.

"In theory, enough students graduate each year to fill all the vacancy positions in Kansas," Holen said. "However, distribution of teachers within the state is uneven, and there are not enough students in selected fields."

The majority of education students specialize in elementary education, while secondary education majors are becoming more scarce, especially in math and science fields.

The College of Education always is looking to increase scholarship money and to target scholarships for students in particular fields, such as math or special education.

About 20 percent of K-State education graduates seek work outside of Kansas, where pay and benefits are much better, Posny said. Kansas ranks No. 38 among starting teacher salaries in the country.

"I don't think I will be teaching in Kansas," said Jamie Shmalberg, sophomore in elementary education. "The average starting pay is pretty low."

Shmalberg said she is intent on teaching, thanks in part to K-State's engaging education program.

Holen said students get hands-on practice early. Curriculum components, such as early field experience, allow students to travel to local classrooms and assist teachers.

"We like students to get experience in the field as early as possible," he said.

In addition to K-State's successful teaching program and efforts, the state of Kansas passed certain measures to make it easier for people to become teachers. The Kansas Legislature allocated more money toward education as well.

For example, Kansas now offers both temporary and restricted teaching licenses so people can begin teaching immediately and complete their licensing requirements later. Also, teachers from other states wishing to teach in Kansas no longer have as strict GPA requirements to be licensed in Kansas.

"We wanted to look at different aspects of the individual, not just their GPA," Posny said.

K-State's efforts and those of the state should incur change, but more needs to be done.

"This is only the beginning," Posny said.

Study-abroad application fee eliminated

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student body president Matt Wagner and vice president Lydia Peele helped eliminate the study-abroad application fee at K-State.

Prior to the elimination of the $50 study-abroad fee, students could not receive advising and meet with a staff member about in-depth study abroad possibilities, Wagner said. Wagner, senior in management information systems, said he and Peele targeted the fee as part of their campaign because they thought giving students the opportunity to learn more about studying abroad was important.

"I personally haven't studied abroad," Wagner said, "but I know people—close friends—who have. They have come back with so much more knowledge about the world and have had the opportunity to learn about the global society."

There are two specific reasons, Wagner said, for encouraging K-State students to check out the program. First, Wagner said President Jon Wehald would like to see more K-State students study abroad.

Kansas Board of Regents members also said during the 2006-07 session they want to see one-fourth of Regents students in Kansas study abroad, Wagner said. With the elimination of the fee, Wagner said K-State potentially can reach these goals.

To make up for the loss of revenue from the study-abroad application fee, K-State's budget office provided a one-time transfer of $30,000 on July 1, said Kenneth Holland, associate provost for international programs, in a K-State Media Relations and Marketing press release.

Several students, however, think the elimination will not increase numbers at all.

Shaun Quigley, senior in civil engineering, studied abroad in Prague last spring at Czech Technical University. He said he thinks only students who are serious about studying abroad will complete the application.

"I think that one of the big reasons people don't apply is because they're lazy," he said. "If you study abroad, you're going to end up paying $7,500 for tuition, $3,500 for room and board, and then $900 or more for a round-trip plane ticket. If you're really serious about studying abroad, $50 isn't that much money."

Quigley said he does think the elimination is a convenience for those who apply, but he does not think it will have any effect on increasing the number of applicants.

Nick Kimminau, senior in advertising, studied abroad in Prague at Charles University.

"I'm really mad at everybody that thinks eliminating the fee is so good," he said. "Students are the ones who are funding the university. Eliminating the fee is pointless because we'll just end up paying for it at one point or another."

"Any idiot can go online and check out studying abroad. I found out everything I needed to know from the Internet and from other people in the university. It wasn't until I was completely sure I wanted to study abroad that I applied."

Jared Palan, junior in architectural engineering, said he worked with Wagner and Peele during their campaign. He said he thinks students who study abroad gain a broader cultural experience.

"It shouldn't really cost you anything to apply," he said. "I felt eliminating the fee was a very good thing to do. But honestly, if people are seriously considering study abroad, it wouldn't have been that big of a shock to pay 50 bucks to find out more information."

CROWDS GATHER IN MAIN PIAZZA OF PAVAROTTI'S HOMETOWN TO MOURN

MILAN, Italy — Hundreds of people gathered Thursday night in Modena's main piazza to pay final respects to Luciano Pavarotti, whose vibrant high C's and ebullient showmanship made him the most beloved and celebrated tenor since Caruso.

The crowd applauded in a sign of respect as pallbearers carried the casket into Modena's cathedral, where a funeral is scheduled for Saturday. The tenor died early Thursday at the age of 71 after a year-long battle with pancreatic cancer.

While Pavarotti moved the world with what one admirer called "the last, great voice" of Italian opera, his legacy went beyond the opera house. The tenor collaborated with classical singers and pop icons alike to bring opera to the masses, rescuing the art from highbrow obscurity in the process.

In many ways, Pavarotti fulfilled the public's imagination of what an opera star should be. He often wore a colorful scarf and a hat, be it a fedora or a beret, and while he didn't always have a beard, it was hard to imagine him without it. His left — as well as a restaurant on his property in Modena — underlined his gourmet appetite.

But above all, his crystal clear voice, prized for its diction, made him the most celebrated tenor since Caruso.

"Pavarotti was the last great Italian voice able to move the world," said Bruno Cagli, president of the Santa Cecilia National Academy in Rome.

SYRIA CLAIMS ISRAELI AIRCRAFT VIOLATED SYRIAN AIR SPACE

DAMASCUS, Syria — The Syrian government charged Thursday that Israeli aircraft dropped "munitions" inside Syria overnight and said its air defenses opened fire in a new escalation of tensions between the decades-old foes.

It was unclear what happened. Syria stopped short of accusing Israel of purposefully bombing its territory, and an Israeli spokesman said he could not comment on military operations.

Analysts speculated such a foray could have been probing Syria's defenses or monitoring long-range missile bases. The path also would have taken the jets near Iran, whose growing power and anti-Israel government worries leaders of the Jewish state.

The incident came after a summer of building tensions that have fed worries of a military conflict erupting between Syria and Israel. Syria accused Israel last month of seeking a pretext for war, and the Israelis are keeping a close watch on Syrian troop movements.

Both sides have insisted they want no conflict along the disputed frontier. But Syria fears it is being squeezed out of a U.S.-brokered Middle East peace conference planned for November and will be left at a disadvantage in the stand-off with Israel.

Syria has grown more vocal in pressing its demand that Israel give back the Golan Heights. Israel, in turn, seeks the return of three Israeli soldiers held for more than a year by two Syrian-allied militant groups, Hezbollah in southern Lebanon and Hamas in the Palestinian lands.

The official Syrian Arab News Agency quoted a military official as saying Israeli jets broke the sound barrier flying over northern Syria before dawn Thursday, then "dropped munitions" onto deserted areas after being shot at by Syria's air defenses.

FELIX DEATH COUNT RISES TO AT LEAST 65 WITH DISCOVERY OF BODIES

PUERTO CABEZAS, Nicaragua — The death count from Hurricane Felix rose to 65 on Thursday with the discovery of the bodies of 25 dead fishermen in the waters along Honduras' Miskito Coast, Nicaraguan and Honduran officials said.

The dead were believed to be from a group of 109 Nicaraguan Miskito Indians who sought refuge in canoes when Felix roared over them.

At least 52 found something to hang onto, fighting for hours to stay alive as huge waves and lightning crashed around them. At least 32 remain missing.

Earlier, Nicaraguan and Honduran officials put the death count from Felix at 40, almost all of them along the coast.

The exhausted survivors told rescuers the storm caught them by surprise, flooding the tiny islands used by lobster fishermen off the Nicaraguan coast and forcing them to spend 16 hours clinging to anything that would float. Many suffered dehydration and were receiving medical care in the seaside town of Villeda Morales, on the Nicaraguan border.

U.S. and Honduran military officials were patrolling the ocean and inlets with helicopters and boats, while soldiers walked the beaches.

10 PALESTINIANIANS KILLED IN CLASHES WITH ISRAELI FORCES IN GAZA

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip — Israeli troops backed by tanks and bulldozers crossed into southern Gaza to strike at Palestinian militants on Thursday, killing 10, a day after Israeli leaders ruled out a large-scale offensive to stop daily rocket salvos from Gaza.

The battle began in the morning and continued for several hours near the southern Gaza city of Khan Younis.

Israel said troops inside Gaza on a routine mission opened fire at a group of militants who approached them, sparking an exchange of fire. Four militants were killed. Gaza's Hamas rulers said militants were targeted either by an Israeli tank shell or missile fire. Dr. Moaiya Hassanain of the Palestinian Health Ministry reported shrapnel wounds consistent with shell fire.

Later in the day, Palestinian militants said fighters in a tractor and Jeep crashed through the fence on the Gaza-Israel border and attacked an Israeli army post.

LIVERPOOL BURIES CHILD WHOSE SLAYING SPARKED GUN DEBATES IN BRITAIN

LIVERPOOL, England — Thousands of mourners dressed in soccer jerseys packed a cathedral Thursday for the funeral of Rhys Jones, an 11-year-old shot dead while walking home from a soccer game and laid to rest in a coffin emblazoned with the crest of his favorite team.

As Stephen Jones carried his son's small coffin down the aisle, his face etched with grief, applause echoed through the church in a gesture bestowed here at the funerals of soccer greats.

Mourners wore their favorite soccer jerseys — blue for Rhys' favorite of Everton, or red for Liverpool in a show of solidarity that transcended traditional soccer rivalries.

"This is another unbearable loss for Liverpool," said John McMurray, 43. "It feels like we just keep getting punched."

The funeral was broadcast on national television. The slaying reopened debate about youth violence in a country where gun crime is rare, but concern about lawless youngsters is rife.

Prime Minister Gordon Brown pledged tougher action on gun crime.

"Guns in America are accepted but we don't want that for Britain," he said. "We want to get guns out of every community."

Rhys was shot in the neck Aug. 22 by a youth on a bicycle as he headed home alone after playing soccer with friends in a well-heeled housing development that borders one of Liverpool's poorer, gang-ridden neighborhoods. Police believe he was likely an innocent victim of a feud between street gangs.

"The heart of the city is being ripped out by all this violence," said James McDougal, 38, who cradled his 3-year-old son on his lap. "All of us feel for the family right now."

U.N. CHIEF, SUDAN PRESIDENT SET NEW DARFUR PEACE TALKS

KHARTOUM, Sudan — The U.N. chief and the Sudanese president announced plans Thursday for a conference next month on ending the conflict in Darfur, but the main rebel factions split over taking part in Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon's peace effort.

A joint communique after the leaders' meeting said the United Nations and the African Union, which have led efforts to get the splintered rebel movements into peace talks with Sudan's government, would issue the invitations to talks set to begin Oct. 27 in Libya.

One rebel faction already responded positively to news of the peace conference, but the leader of the largest movement rejected the proposal.

Before that development, Ban emerged from his meeting with Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir with an upbeat tone.

"We have taken a big step toward our shared goal of bringing peace to Darfur and looking forward to the long-term development of Sudan," Ban said at a news conference. "We are at a new beginning. Let us seize this moment together."

He stressed the importance of resolving the nearly five-year conflict between rebels from ethnic African farming villages and the Arab-dominated government.

The war has killed more than 200,000 people and chased 2.5 million from their homes in Sudan's vast western region.

All parties should "cease all hostilities immediately (to) create a secure environment in Darfur conducive to the negotiations," Ban said after his second round of talks with al-Bashir.

Khalil Ibrahim, head of the Justice and Equality Movement rebel group, said he would attend the talks.

"We are ready for new peace negotiations. We have set our agenda," he told The Associated Press by telephone from Darfur.

But Ibrahim added that his troops, who have spearheaded a surge of attacks on government forces, would not cease hostilities during the talks.

"We don't want to repeat the mistakes of Abuja," he said, referring to negotiations last year in Nigeria's capital, during which most rebel leaders said they agreed to a truce without obtaining security commitments from the Sudanese government.

TAILGATING GUIDE

Ahead of the game

The object of Ladder Golf is to wrap golf-ball bolas around one of the three rungs. The bottom rung is worth one point, the middle rung is worth two points and the top rung is worth three points.

Evening fun can have variety

By Andy Heintz
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Saturday will be an exciting day for Wildcat football fans as K-State plays in its home opener against San Jose State.

Saturday also will mark the start of tailgating season. While some fans are satisfied with just barbecuing and drinking a few beers before the games, others like tailgating games.

Polish Hockey is an example of a tailgating game that is not as well known. The object of the game is to knock off a bottle balanced on top of an opposing player's PVC pipe with a Frisbee.

The materials needed for this game are few and easy to obtain. Two 4 1/2-foot PVC pipes, a Frisbee and two glass bottles are all that are needed to create a fun game.

"If you throw the Frisbee, and it hits the opposing players' pipe, you get one point," said Brandon Kniffin, junior in management systems.

"You get two points if you knock over the bottle on top of the pipe," Kniffin said. "You get three points if you knock the bottle off the pipe and it is not caught by the opposing player standing behind the pipe."

Kniffin also said if a throw only hits the pipe, the player gets one point.

The final score is determined by house rules.

Ladder Golf is an example of another tailgating game. According to www.laddergolf.com, each player has three golf ball bolas. A bola consists of two golf balls tied to a nylon rope. One or two

In Polish Hockey, players attempt to either knock the bottle off the PVC pipe or hit the pipe with a Frisbee.

Tailgate items are easy to forget

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In all the excitement preparing for the first home tailgate and football game of the season, there are many things that might be forgotten. Here is a list of items that easily can slip the mind on Saturday mornings.

GOOD MUSIC

This might seem like common sense, but some tailgates rely on the shuffle option on their MP3 players. Big mistake.

While the device in question might have a great overall selection of songs, not all songs are appropriate for the pre-game tailgating setting.

When choosing a playlist for any gathering, it is important to think of the mood you want to set. Because those listening are about to go into a football game, fast-paced, loud songs are often good choices. Guns N' Roses, Incubus and Metallica are all great selections for music like this.

Also, don't forget to include the K-State Fight Song.

TICKET/ID

This also might seem like common sense, but you would be surprised how many people get too excited when leaving and forget their tickets or IDs. Make sure you have them.

DON'T DRINK MUCH, UNLESS IT'S WATER

The forecast for Saturday is 86 degrees and sunny. That means it's going to be hot. Make sure you are drinking enough water to ensure you can stay and cheer the entire game.

WEAR PURPLE

It is important to wear as much purple as possible. The boys on the field need to be able to look into the stands and see a sea of purple. It's the little things like this that can mean the difference between winning and losing.

CLEAN UP

After the win is recorded and the crowds start going home, the signs of tailgating remain. The trash left by happy celebrants creates a big mess. Cleanup will be easier all around if each group takes five extra minutes to tidy up its area.

STAY PROTECTED FROM THE SUN

Though this week's game starts at 6:05 p.m., the sun still will be setting directly onto the student section. What does this mean? A lot of intense sun rays bearing right down on your skin. Those rays are nothing to worry about, as long as you have sunscreen and sunglasses.

KEYS

One of the most important traditions in any home football game is what the crowd does at kickoff to intimidate the other team. At Auburn last weekend, the crowd shouted "U-of-A" at every kickoff. Here in Manhattan, we have the key shakes. Don't forget your keys.

Game-day recipe suggestions have West Coast flavor in honor of San Jose State game

Saturday marks the first home game of K-State's football season, and many students, alumni and fans will flock to the areas surrounding Snyder Family Stadium to tailgate prior to the game. Frozen burger patties and hot dogs are always a favorite but come up short in creativity and often are overused.

In honor of a Wildcat win over San Jose State, this week I suggest a few easy tailgating recipes with a little West Coast flavor.

Items people can eat with their hands are a good choice for reducing costs and messes.

Avocados and tomatoes are essential for any California dish. Pre-made guacamole and chips are a wonderful snack to munch on while waiting for the coals and grill to heat up.

EL REY GUACAMOLE

Pit the avocados by cutting them in half lengthwise. Once the pit is removed, scoop out avocado from inside the skin. Place diced tomatoes, onion, cilantro and garlic in the freezer bag with avocados. Remember, the smaller the pieces, the better everything will be incorporated.

Add Tabasco sauce, lime and lemon juices to the bag. Add black pepper and salt, and seal the bag. Mix the ingredients in the bag thoroughly with your hands until everything is well mixed. Taste and add more salt and pepper if needed.

Place bag in the refrigerator until ready to serve.

When ready to serve, cut off a small section of the corner at the bottom of the bag and squeeze guacamole out into a large bowl. Serve with tortilla chips.

Grilling can be one of the hardest yet rewarding forms of cooking. Start cooking too early and one might run the risk of having a well-done exterior and raw interior.

If possible, use charcoal. Gas can leave unwanted flavors. This is possible when using a charcoal starter or lighter fluid to start coals.

Using a charcoal chimney might take longer to get the coals going, but it will leave a clear flavor, allowing the natural spices to really be the selling point of the food.

Coals are ready to cook on once they reach a gray color with no flames coming up. The coals should sit at least two inches lower than the grate upon which food will cook.

INGREDIENTS

El Rey guacamole	1 lime, juiced	cut into strips about 1.5 to 2 in. thick	Large pinch sugar
4 avocados	1/2 large lemon, juiced	1/3 cup olive oil	One gallon-sized freezer bag
4 Roma tomatoes, diced to 1/2 cm. wide	A few drops of Tabasco sauce	3 limes, juiced	Margarita
1/2 white onion, finely diced	Black pepper and salt to taste	1/3 cup Tequila	1 oz. white tequila
1/4 bundle fresh cilantro, finely diced and without stems	1 gallon-sized freezer bag	4 cloves garlic, minced	1/2 oz. Grand Marnier
	Tequila lime chicken	3 tbsp. cilantro, thyme, rosemary and oregano	2 oz. fresh lime juice
	4 boneless chicken breasts,	1/2 tsp. salt and pepper	4 oz. ice
			Lime wedge
			Salt

A sweet-and-sour flavor will wake up those taste buds in the afternoon. The first dish is Tequila Lime Chicken.

TEQUILA LIME CHICKEN

Mix all the ingredients together and pour them over the chicken in a freezer bag.

Allow the mixture to marinate overnight or at least three to four hours in the refrigerator.

Cook on the grill until internal temperature is more than 180 degrees.

MARGARITA

After eating, it is important to clear those taste buds with refreshing drink. Nothing quenches a thirst on a hot day like a good old-fashioned margarita.

Take a lime wedge and run it around the edge of a glass. Dip the rim of the glass in salt until it's coated.

Mix liquors and lime juice in a shaker, and shake it for 20 seconds.

Pour over ice, that has been placed in the glass. Sit back and enjoy.

With a successful tailgate completed, head into the stadium and help cheer on the Wildcats.

Freshmen have options to get involved, use resources on campus

By Emily Sterk
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The first semester at college is an important time for students to learn study habits and make decisions to enable success for the rest of their college career.

If students do not know some of the necessary preparations for their education, there are resources that can give them answers.

Justin Baer, 2004 graduate of New York University, said a common problem for students is not utilizing what is available to them on campus.

"College has set up so many resources to give students good grades," he said.

Baer launched a college preparation production company—College Crossroads—that released an instructional DVD for succeeding in college, called "Cracking College: The Seven Secrets of Savvy Students."

Baer said college is like the new high school because there are more people going to college now than 20 years ago, and now the focus is not on who is going to college, but who is going to get into graduate school.

"First-semester grades are just as important as their last-semester grades," Baer said. "It really matters how you do in college."

J.D. Whiteside, sophomore in construction science and management, said missing class can affect students' grades at the end of the semester.

"Students who go to class score better," Whiteside said.

Baer said instructors can help students by making them feel welcome.

He said professors have office hours, and a majority of students do not think about meeting their instructor outside of class.

Students can also get help from a tutor, and Baer said that is how students can make the most progress.

"It is like getting a personal trainer at the gym," he said. "Lance Armstrong has a personal trainer, and he probably doesn't need one, but having a tutor makes it better and gives the student one-on-one experience with the content."

He said students should learn to utilize the time they have to study and time for themselves.

"It is a new transition, and students could spiral out of control," Baer said. "We don't want students to get to that point of not turning in homework or missing tests."

Breana Pickernell, employee at the Academic and Career Information Center, said incoming freshmen have the pressure of learning new study habits, picking a major and learning time management.

"They don't just adjust their study skills to the college level—there is a lot more reading," Pickernell said.

She said many students think they have to know what they will major in before they come to K-State, but they should not be afraid to explore what they want to do.

"They should go into something they enjoy that is an interest and close to their personality," Pickernell said.

She said students should also try mock interviews and work on their résumés during their time at college.

"A big thing is internships during the summer," she said. "It gives just a glimpse of what to look forward to after college."

According to the Academic and Career Information Center's Web site, the center has resources and workshops to help students decide on a major.

Ashley Westover, freshman in biology and pre-medicine, said she has learned not to worry about deciding on a major right away.

Though there is pressure to not waste time and money, she said it is important to explore majors.

"Keeping your options open to figure out what you want to do is OK," Westover said.

She also said she thinks freshmen should not wait to get involved on campus.

Lucas McGarity, senior in secondary education, said a good start to college life is to get involved but to be careful not get overwhelmed.

"Don't get involved in a whole bunch of things—pick one or two things, and try to do really well," he said.

Besides academics, Baer said students can find resources on campus for personal issues like health.

"Most campuses provide free counseling," he said. "If a student has a problem, whether pertaining to an eating disorder or a drinking problem, students shouldn't feel weird about going."

Feds raid Wichita offices of unrecognized Indian tribe

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA — The self-proclaimed leader of an American Indian tribe not recognized by the federal government was arrested Thursday amid an ongoing multistate investigation into the sale of tribal memberships to immigrants.

Agents from the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the Social Security Administration's Office of Inspector General raided the Kaweah Indian Nation's two Wichita offices and arrested Malcolm L. Webber, also known as Grand Chief Thunderbird IV, according to the U.S. attorney's office and ICE.

ICE said it is investigating whether Webber, 69, illegally sold tribal memberships to both legal and illegal immigrants under the misconception that the documents provided immediate U.S. citizenship.

No charges had been filed by Thursday afternoon. Webber was being held at the Sedgwick County Jail.

Agents were going through boxes of records Thursday at the tribe's two Wichita offices. Jim Cross, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, said the search warrants were for anything related to sales of tribal memberships.

"Search warrants were served at those places. Webber has been arrested, and we anticipate federal charges will be filed in that case," Cross said.

Webber is not an Indian and Kaweah Indian Nation is not a legitimate Indian tribe, Cross said.

A woman who answered the phone at Webber's Wichita home Thursday said the family would have no comment. Tribal spokesman Manuel Urbina could not be reached on his cell phone. No tribal members could be found at its headquarters, where agents were seen going through cardboard boxes of records. Webber has declined repeated requests for comment since reports of the federal investigation first surfaced.

In the past, Urbina has denied the tribe, which purports to have 10,000 members nationwide, was doing anything illegal.

He claimed others who were not part of the tribe were selling tribal documents.

The Kaweah Indian Nation, which was denied federal recognition in 1984, has been at the center of a multistate federal investigation into the alleged selling of tribal memberships to illegal immigrants, with the promise the documents would protect them from deportation.

On Aug. 15, the tribe's secretary, a woman from El Salvador, and her Guatemalan husband were charged in Wichita with federal immigration violations that prosecutors said were linked to the case.

Days later, the Texas attorney general's office sued Webber, Kaweah Indian Nation Inc. and two tribal members.

The lawsuit alleged they fraudulently sold memberships by claiming that tribal members could get a Social Security number, protection from deportation and U.S. citizenship once the tribe is federally recognized.

In a 1984 ruling, the Bureau of Indian Affairs found that Kaweah Indian Nation Inc. did not exist before 1980, when it was formed under the leadership of Webber. The bureau called it an urban Indian interest group from Porterville, Calif., that had no relation to the aboriginal Kaweah Indians.

The bureau finding also documented the tribe's contentious history, noting it was formed as a result of an internal dispute with a similar group formed by Webber in 1976, the United Lumbee Nation of North Carolina and America Inc. It also noted Webber's tumultuous relationship with Oatman, Ariz., residents and his arrest there on a sex-related charge involving two 5-year-old girls.

The Kaweah's pitch to immigrants became public when the Nebraska Mexican-American Commission posted a warning on its Web site.

The commission said church members from several Nebraska cities said they were approached by representatives of the tribe and it heard similar stories from other states.

"I'm just impressed that the arrest took place so quickly," said Angel Freytez, spokesman for the Nebraska Mexican-American Commission. "Regardless of (immigrants') status in the U.S., we cannot allow other people to profit from the drama and tragedy of others."

Marilu Cabrera, spokeswoman for U.S. Bureau of Citizenship and Immigration Services, said illegal immigrants should be cautious.

"Even though you consider yourself a victim, if you're here unlawfully you potentially put yourself at risk," Cabrera said. "So that's why it's very important to be very vigilant."

In Wichita, the raid came as welcome news to the Peoples Alliance for Latino Advancement in Kansas, a Hispanic advocacy group. PALA co-chair Dennis Romero said illegal immigrants are desperate since immigration reform was died in Congress.

"They have nothing in Mexico, no life whatsoever in Mexico," Romero said. "So they will hang onto anything here—even joining a fake Indian tribe."

License to wed

Engaged students learn requirements, regulations for process of obtaining legal permission to get married

By Megan Molitor
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With an event that includes a white dress, a church full of people and a cake the size of a small child, wedding planning can be a exciting and stressful time. One of the most important parts about planning the big day, however, is something not quite that glamorous, and that is getting a marriage license.

A marriage license is permission from a legal authority for the marriage of two people to be performed. Getting one is a foreign process to most people who have not gone through it yet, which can just add more stress when the time comes to get one.

"I didn't really know anything about getting a marriage license beforehand," said Larissa Adair, 2007 K-State graduate. "I actually called the church where we got married to ask them how it worked."

Adair, who was married April 14, said it was fairly simple after the church told her where to go.

"The courthouse was very helpful in telling me exactly what I needed to do before and after the wedding and how to obtain copies of the license," she said. "The weirdest thing about the marriage license was that my husband and I did not have to sign it. I learned that in Riley County, the couple doesn't have to sign, only the pastor and two witnesses."

Adair said she used her license copies to get a new driver's license and social security card.

Jordan Weninger said she also did not know much about the process before she planned her wedding.

Weninger, senior in music education, was married on Aug. 4. She said all she knew before obtaining her license was that it cost $50, and both she and her fiancé needed to be there.

"Then I found out that we have to fill out the application and go back to the courthouse and pay the $50," she said. "At that time we got a duplicate of our application and the original. The original would be signed by our priest, and he would mail it back to the courthouse."

Weninger said she paid $1.25 for each copy of the license.

Doris Zimmerman, District Court deputy clerk, said the first step in the process is to come in and fill out a short affidavit.

"It asks for your name, where you live, birthday, driver's license or social security number, and then you swear to the information," Zimmerman said.

After a three-day waiting period, the clerk's office sends another form to ask about your family. It is then returned to the office with a $50 charge. The license is typed after that, Zimmerman said.

"Once you get your license, you can get married anywhere in the state for up to a six-month period," she said.

Zimmerman said applicants go to the office daily, usually about four per day, with Mondays and Fridays being the biggest day.

For more information, contact the District Court in Manhattan at 110 Courthouse Plaza or by calling (785) 565-6200.

Man charged with Kelsey Smith's murder pleads not guilty to sex with a minor

By The Associated Press

OLATHE, Kan. — The man who faces capital murder charges in the abduction, rape and strangulation death of 18-year-old Kelsey Smith pleaded not guilty Wednesday to separate charges of having sex with a 14-year-old runaway.

Edwin R. Hall, 26, is charged with two counts of aggravated indecent liberties for allegedly having sexual intercourse with the girl in July 2004. A judge on Wednesday determined there was enough evidence for the case to go to trial, and Hall entered the not-guilty plea.

No trial date was set, but a hearing was scheduled for Oct. 19.

Hall also has pleaded not guilty to charges of capital murder, kidnapping, rape and aggravated sodomy in the slaying of Smith, of Overland Park, Kan. He is accused of abducting Smith on June 2 from a Target parking lot in suburban Kansas City, Kan. Grainy surveillance video from the store appeared to show Smith being confronted and pushed into her car.

Her body was found four days later in a park about 20 miles away in Missouri. Hall was interviewed and arrested June 6, after he saw himself on television in surveillance video and contacted a lawyer, who called police.

The girl in the 2004 case recently was brought to Kansas for the hearing from Arizona, where she has been serving time in a juvenile detention facility. The girl is named in court documents, but it is The Associated Press' policy not to identify most victims of sex crimes.

Court documents show that a police report was filed July 22, 2004, in the case involving the 14-year-old. But the case was marked "closed/cleared" and "unfounded" about two months later. Hall was not charged then.

The girl was charged later in 2004 in Johnson County with criminal trespass and obstruction of justice. She pleaded guilty to the obstruction charge, a misdemeanor. The trespassing charge was dismissed, documents show. Hall was listed as a witness on the complaint.

The initial report on the 2004 case was not filed by the girl but by a third party.

The girl testified Wednesday that she ran away from TLC, an Olathe facility for runaways, families, and children in need of alternate housing, in July 2004 and met Hall at the apartment where he was living with two other men. The complex is separated from TLC by a chain-link fence.

The girl, who appeared in court in ankle chains, jeans and a white T-shirt, said she had sex with Hall twice and that it was not against her will. She was the only person testifying Wednesday.

The girl said when she met Hall, who she called "Jack," he flirted with her and began "hitting on" her while she, Hall and two other men watched a Rob Zombie movie in one of the apartment bedrooms.

"He was saying I was pretty and was like 'I want to get to know you better,'" she said. "We talked about me being a runaway and how he wanted to run away and possibly start a new life."

When asked by prosecutor Chris McMullin if Hall was "nice to her," the girl said "yes."

"He never yelled at me or hit me," she said.

beat us every year, it might not mean anything. But it's KU, and we want to stick it to them."

Friday's race will be a 5-kilometer race for both teams. Last weekend's races at the J.K. Gold Classic in Augusta, Kan., were 6 kilometers for men and 4 kilometers for women. Junior Danny Schneider said the shorter distance for the men parallels high school distances.

"It's a really good place for the freshmen to step up and show what they can do," he said. "I think we can utilize the freshmen and challenge KU and see what we can get out of that."

Last year, the KU men's team was ranked in the top-20 nationally. Schneider said though this is daunting, Kansas definitely has weaknesses that make them vulnerable.

"They're a very good team, but at the same time they're definitely beatable," he said. "This coming weekend, they're not bringing their No. 2 runner, so there's potential there. We could get our top three guys in there and have a good shot of knocking them off."

Smith acknowledged KU's ability last year and said the opportunity to run against them gives K-State a better idea of where they stand.

"We want to get better so we want to see how we measure up against them," he said. "We're looking forward to the competitive aspect of this meet."

GAMES | Activities fill spare time

ladders can be used, depending on whether or not more than one are available.

"The ladder has three rungs. PVC pipes are used as the rungs, and two PVC pipes are on the sides," said Marcus McFall, senior in business management.

The point of the game is to wrap the bolas around one of the rungs of the ladder. The top rung is worth the most points, usually three. The middle rung is usually worth two and the bottom rung worth one. The bola does not need to be completely wrapped around the pipe, it just needs to be hanging.

One player from each team gets three throws per turn before the opposing team gets to throw their three. Players are encouraged to knock the opposing players' bolas from the rungs, and if an opposing bola is knocked off the rung, it is no longer counted for points. The game can be played in teams of two or individually. In this contest, members of the team take turns throwing the three bolas.

To determine which players gets the first turn, a coin is flipped. The game ends when a player gets to exactly 21 points, and if a person goes higher than 21 during a round, the points for the round are subtracted from his or her score. Ladder Golf is more challenging than other tailgating games, but just as fun.

AUTUMN WEDDINGS

Making arrangements

Brides have options when choosing floral arrangements for fall ceremonies

By Sydney Eagleton
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Picking the perfect floral arrangements for the big day can be almost as important as any other detail.

The perfect flowers create the mood, the atmosphere and setting that highlights the occasion.

Using the colors that are provided by nature in autumn, like oranges, deep reds, yellows and greens is an option, but weddings are also an opportunity to get creative with colors. The bride and groom ultimately need to be happy with the outcome.

"Brides play up the season in the fall more than in other seasons," said Jennifer Mellick, senior consultant at Inspirion Event Planning in Olathe, Kan. "They use seasonal items (in floral arrangements), like leaves, the burgundies and such."

There also are several colors to choose from that can contrast with the pastels of spring but are still not generic fall colors. Using brown as a base color and then a pastel as an accent helps bring in color without making an arrangement look like a cornucopia.

According to www.weddinggazette.com, this is best done with branch-filled vases that have accents of pastel flowers or ribbon. This is typically done in more contemporary weddings where brides feel comfortable stepping away from the norm of using only flowers.

There are several flowers available and suitable all year long. These are generally cheaper and easier to find because they are not specific to a season, Mellick said.

"Gerbera daisies are very popular right now and come in a variety of colors," said Karen Medlin, owner of Westloop Floral. "They are great in bouquets and in arrangements."

Other flowers that are suitable all year long are carnations, which come in many colors: gardenias, which are white; stephanotis, which are also white and serve as a filler flower; orchids, which are very popular in spring with their pop of color in the center; and many others.

Checking in with a local florist to see what is cheapest and readily available will be the best way to save some money.

For brides who want an autumn-specific floral arrangement, there are flowers only available in the fall, so

Weddings become more nontraditional

By Erin Fisher
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Couples who celebrate fall weddings tend to favor tradition, but several have started to completely disregard certain wedding customs.

"It's hard to think of something nontraditional anymore," said Karen Medlin, owner of Westloop Floral. "Our traditions are changing."

Many choose orange and brown earth tones for fall wedding color schemes, but these are not the only colors available. Pairing darker shades with lighter shades add a chic and classic appeal to any fall wedding.

Theknot.com, a wedding-help Web site, suggests plum paired with a creamy blush color, or navy blue blended with a light shade of gold. The Knot also suggests combining red or cream with mocha or cappuccino, instead of ordinary brown.

"We are seeing a lot of mocha," Medlin said. "I think that's a fun color for fall, and there is a lot you can do with it."

Some colors that are still common are fall colors like orange, gold and yellow. Touches of red or purple might be added, Medlin said.

"I try to tell girls that different shades of a color give a bouquet or arrangement depth," she said.

Color schemes can be used in flower arrangements and table decorations. One wedding myth is pumpkins must be used in decorations to make a fall wedding complete. Instead of incorporating pumpkins, you can use harvest grains like millet or wheat to add a different sense of the season.

"There are a lot of neat grasses and berries," Medlin said. "Fall is a nice time of year for some different things in addition to flowers."

Adding fruit centerpieces with apples and pears can add a twist instead of the traditional use of pumpkins.

Another significant part of any wedding is the bride's dress. White is the traditional color for most brides because it signifies purity, said Alesha Edmondson, retail worker for Weisner's Sew Unique and Bridal.

"Pretty much the only thing they are sticking to is white or ivory," Edmondson said. "Not too many girls get colors for dresses."

Some brides have tried on dresses that are non-traditional, she said.

"We had someone come in and try on a tea-length (dress)," Edmondson said. "It was a bridesmaid dress that was red."

Comfort is also a plus when it comes to choosing a wedding dress.

"Some girls don't care if they have a big poofy wedding dress," Edmondson said. "They just want to be comfortable."

Bridesmaids' dresses also are important. Dark or bright colors can be chosen to add

MY STORY

Student awed by ice-rink proposal

My Story features an engagement story from any student. If you would like to share your story, please e-mail Salena at news@pub.ksu.edu.

I cannot remember the exact moment when I met Brandon Kniffin. We had three classes together sophomore year, and he just sort of faded into my life. This year of high school for us brought about many changes of friends. We started the year sitting at the same table for lunch but on opposite ends. Eventually throughout the year I migrated my way down to his end, and we would look forward to sitting by each other each day.

One night he called me and asked if I wanted to meet him at the movies. We were only 15, meaning I was too young to go on an actual date. I didn't think I could go, but after I hung up the phone I had this strong feeling to go to the movies. I called a friend and went to the movies with Brandon and his friend. In the middle of the movie he reached for my hand. We still joke about it today, but it took him several hours to convince me to start dating him that night.

When our town opened a new high school, Brandon went there and I stayed at our old high school. We had our share of jazz dances where we found our song — "Fly Me to the Moon" by Frank Sinatra.

Some of our favorite memories involve his soccer games, late-night swimming and hanging out at each other's houses after school. Finally, after two years at different schools with different friends, we were back together at K-State. It is great to have mutual friends once again.

I am a planner at heart, and in my head I thought we would get engaged toward the end of our junior year and get married right out of college.

So on Dec. 23, 2006, I had no idea what was coming.

Christmas is a big family holiday for Brandon. All of his extended family travels into Kansas City, Kan., every year and they spend a whole week together.

That night Brandon invited me to go ice skating at Crown Center with his family and asked me to invite mine. I thought it was a great idea for the Christmas season to get our families to do something together. We went to Crown Center late in the evening, and the entire rink was lit with white Christmas lights. It was beautiful.

Most of the younger people started ice skating while the rest of the family started visiting. Brandon and I stopped in the corner to talk with our families, and my Mom pointed behind me and said to look. When I turned around, Brandon was down on one knee and asked, "Will you marry me?" This caught me a little off guard. At first I said, "No, don't do this right now," because I thought he was asking me to get married very soon.

After asking him if he was serious and asking him if he meant after college, I said yes. I started crying, and he put the perfect ring on my finger. My family and some other people at the rink started clapping as we spun around and kissed.

Brandon and I intend to get married after graduation in 2009 in Olathe, Kan. He hopes to work for the FBI, and I would like to work in the environmental-science field. We are not sure yet where we would like to live, but we are hoping to venture somewhere new together.

Lori Wadell is a junior in biology, and Brandon Kniffin is a junior in management information systems.

On the go

Newlyweds make 'getaways' in, on a variety of vehicles

By Salena Strate
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After the ceremony, brides and grooms traditionally escape the hustle and bustle of wedding activities. The newlyweds are whisked away from their friends and family in anything from automobiles to bicycles or sometimes even a hot-air balloon.

Mary Sutterlin, owner of Classic Rose Limousine Services, said a limousine makes a classy exit and a big statement.

"Brides and grooms are getting into something special and taking off," she said. "It gives the couple a little break and a little breathing room before the reception. This might be the only time the entire day they have to be together."

Sutterlin said an average ride for wedding parties is less than an hour, because she drives the couples around town and to the reception. For a one-hour rental, Classic Rose charges $95. It is $85 per hour for rentals of two hours or more.

Wedding parties have grown larger over the years, so Sutterlin said to plan accordingly for all members of the party. Classic Rose's limo seats six to eight people.

Other considerations for exits include deciding what outfit the chauffeur will wear. If the wedding is set in a western theme, consider having the chauffeur dress like a cowboy. Also, be sure to ask questions about extra services like bottles of champagne, a compact disc player and a roll of red carpet before the couple steps out.

The tradition of beer cans and shaving cream add to a memorable exit. Car-decorating kits are available at Mr. P's Party Store for $1.25 to $9.50. Included in the kit are pompoms, balloons and window chalk to decorate the ride.

Another option for an exclusive getaway is a bicycle. At the end of the wedding reception, Christina Amini and Elspeth Stowell from Ross, Calif., jumped on their bikes and rode away. The couple's bikes were decorated with strands of fake pearls and boas. The couple was featured on www.theknot.com.

One inexpensive option for couples on a budget is to hand firework sparklers to each guest. Instruct each guest to light their sparkler as the bride and groom exit the ceremony location.

Ashlei Sisel, graduate student in accounting, said sparklers are not something she would consider using in her wedding. However, she said they would be a great alternative to throwing rice.

"We are planning one limo for our wedding party and another for my fiancé and I," Sisel said. "I care more about the importance of being a host to my guests than about planning any big exit."

Sail-Away Adventures of Topeka, a hot-air balloon company, said they have been a part of many wedding escapes.

"Each year we get more calls about proposals and wedding escapes," said Chris Tantillo, owner of Sail-Away Adventures. "The only problem with hot-air balloons is scheduling."

Tantillo said for a hot-air balloon exit, the weather forecast has to include very light winds. Also, an open area is required for take-off and landing, as problems would occur if take-off took place in the middle of town, he said.

Sail-Away Adventures' largest balloon carries five people and costs $500 to $1,000, depending on the wedding location, Tantillo said.

Amanda Ratzlaff, junior in apparel design, had her wedding June 4 in Manhattan. Ratzlaff used the close location of her ceremony and reception to create another inexpensive entrance. Ratzlaff provided bubble bottles for her guests to open and blow at the newly married couple.

"Bubbles are inexpensive, considering how expensive a wedding is," she said. "I didn't feel the need to spend any more money on an exit."

Ratzlaff said she thought a hot-air balloon exit could have been too dramatic and would not have had any meaning in her big day.

After Tricia Bergman and her husband got married, they rode around in a limo. Bergman, junior in elementary education, said the limo was a nice break from the busy day.

"The whole day is rush, rush," Bergman said. "When we actually got in the limo, we finally realized — we are now a married couple."

"I'm sure all brides would agree with the morning starting with hair being done, going to the church and people constantly taking pictures. It was so busy. When we got into the limo we had time to soak up everything that just happened."

Thrift stores see boost in business with students' arrival

By Patrick Longman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The surge of students back in Manhattan for the semester not only increased the population but business as well.

Many students started the semester shopping for household items and clothing at local thrift stores.

Roger Andrews, co-owner of the Grand Ol' Trunk said this time of year, students buy a lot of coffee tables and bookcases.

"People like to go to the shops and hunt for treasures," he said. "I'd like to see the pile of stuff I have sold in the past 25 years."

Grand Ol' Trunk has several sections of used items for customers to browse, like furniture, household items, clothing and music.

Around the Manhattan area, students have several options for finding used items.

Regena Johnson, owner of Second Thyme Around, said she has the most business when students return in the fall.

"I love the fall semester," Johnson said. "August and September are like our payday — our Christmas."

As a single parent of four, Johnson said she always was looking for a bargain, and that is why she opened the store.

"I thought I could give other people good stuff at a good price," she said.

While popular among antique hunters and fashionistas, thrift stores are embraced by people of all ages.

Allie Anderson, senior in anthropology, said she shops at the Grand Ol' Trunk because she likes to look at old things and find good prices.

"Usually I come to look and end up buying," she said.

Patti Spani, Manhattan resident, said she mostly shops at thrift stores for clothing for her grandchildren, and she appreciates what the stores can do for the community.

"Thrift stores help both the consumer and the one cleaning out their house," she said.

Johnson's son, André Quinton, owns his own thrift store — Another Thyme. Both said men and women of all income levels shop in thrift stores.

The two often help each other by referring customers to the other's shop when something is not available.

Johnson said the majority of her customers are women, with equal amounts of students and military personnel.

"I have my trendy vintage-wearing college girls who come in twice a week because they don't want to miss anything," Johnson said. "And then I have my high-dollar local ladies who come in three times a week."

Men, she said, generally buy vintage clothing, knives or fishing lures.

Quinton said he is making some additions to his store for men who are dragged into thrift-store shopping. He said he plans to install an Xbox and a television for an area in his store he called a "man station."

At the beginning of the year, students go to the local thrift stores to find deals on furniture for their residences. The Grand Ol' Trunk and the Salvation Army are a couple shopping options students have.

Couples choose engagement length based on circumstances, preferences

By Mark Wampler
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Hayley Martin and her fiancé, John Huffstutler, owe a lot to Mickey Mouse and his pals.

"We met at Disney World," said Martin, junior in hotel and restaurant management. "We were camping right next to his family, and all the kids of the campground hang out with each other."

The Huffstutler family is from Pennsylvania, and the Martins are from Kansas, but the couple got a chance to see each other every year when their families traveled to Walt Disney World Resort.

This June, after five years of dating, the couple was engaged at the same Disney World that brought them together, but they are going to have to wait a while to tie the knot.

"We made a deal with my parents, where I would graduate college before we get married," Martin said.

They don't plan on being married until April 2009, a year and a half after their engagement, but even that is not certain.

"He is in the Air Force, so we don't know if we can really set a date for sure,"

Martin said. "We don't know if he will be deployed."

Richard Harris, professor of psychology who has taught at K-State for 30 years, has not seen long engagements gaining popularity among the public.

"I don't think it's a particular trend, although people are deferring getting married to a later age," Harris said.

The U.S. Census Bureau confirms Harris' observation. According to its statistics, the median age of Americans at first marriage has increased by about a year every decade since the 1960s, from around the age of 23 to the age of 27.

"The timing is very individualistic," he said. For some people, it's probably the right thing to do. For others, it's not."

The Rev. Keith Weber, chaplain of St. Isidore Catholic Student Center, agreed.

"I have worked with couples who get married less than a year after they meet, and I also have worked with a couple who dated for 17 years before they got married," Weber said.

Weber said he thinks the process of choosing when to get married involves a variety of factors.

"A couple should wait until they are sure they are marrying the right person — not just a good friend, not just someone they love, but the one who brings out the best in them and will do so for the rest of their life," he said.

"If it takes a long time to make this determination, then they should be dating, or engaged, for a long time."

Some argue that long-term engagements create added stress and more difficulties, but the debate continues.

However, most people, like Weber and Martin, said, they think it depends on the couple.

Weber said he thinks a long-term engagement is much better than a quick one.

"Marriage is for the rest of people's lives, and if it takes a long time to make sure they are marrying the right person, they should take a long time," he said.

"Marriage should never be rushed into."

One thing is certain — Martin and Huffstutler do not have to worry about rushing into anything, and Martin said she wishes they could marry sooner, she said she is content to wait.

At least they have plenty of time to make sure the cake tastes just right.

Legislative committee airs Kline's 1998 case against Wichita abortion doctor

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — It wasn't the criminal trial abortion opponents had hoped for, but a legislative committee allowed them to air a case against Dr. George Tiller that was tossed out of court last year.

Anti-abortion groups also staged a small rally during a lunch break Thursday, and about 40 people marched to the building that houses Attorney General Paul Morrison's office. Their chants called on him to enforce a 1998 state law restricting late-term abortions and to resign for not being vigorous enough in prosecuting Tiller, one of a few U.S. doctors performing late-term abortions.

Morrison has filed 19 misdemeanors against Tiller in Sedgewick County, alleging the Wichita doctor didn't obtain a second opinion on late-term abortions from an independent physician, as required by the law.

Many abortion foes say Tiller should be prosecuted instead for performing such procedures for "trivial" reasons, not medical emergencies. Morrison's predecessor, Phill Kline, brought such a case in December, only to see it dismissed for jurisdictional reasons.

The legislative committee reviewed a DVD recording of an interview with abortion opponents' star witness, who said the mental health problems Tiller saw in patients couldn't justify aborting viable fetuses. A Wichita-area psychologist later said that assessment was wrong, though anti-abortion members of the committee were skeptical.

Meanwhile, Morrison continued to worry that the publicity generated by abortion opponents' campaign against Tiller would affect his case. His office believed playing the DVD could make it harder to find an impartial jury.

"I don't know what, if any, repercussions that's going to have," Morrison said. "We'll have to talk about it."

Morrison didn't attend the legislative hearing. He also wasn't in his office when the anti-abortion protesters arrived because he was attending an international conference on financial fraud in the Kansas City area.

"It's up to us to keep the pressure on," Kathy Ostrowski, a lobbyist for Kansans for Life, the state's largest anti-abortion group, told the activists before their march from the Statehouse.

Tiller's attorneys have repeatedly said he is innocent.

"This is just another attempt to dredge up the dismissed case peddled by Phill Kline," said attorney Dan Monnat. "Dr. Tiller has fought for years to protect the privacy of the women's medical files. It's sad that once again, these women have to continue to wonder whether the content of their files is going to be exploited for political gain."

The legislative committee's hearing became the arena for reviewing allegations against Tiller because it is reviewing the 1998 late-term abortion law. It may recommend changes.

The law applies after the 21st week of pregnancy and when a fetus can survive outside the womb. For an abortion to be performed, two doctors must conclude that if the pregnancy continues, a woman or girl could die or face "substantial and irreversible" harm to "a major bodily function." Also, the two physicians cannot be legally or financially affiliated.

KELSEY | K-State student wants to speak out against abduction, rape

Lindsey said several memorial services, funerals, visitations and candlelight vigils took place over the next few days, including a public service fed live over the Internet and several news stations.

A day after Kelsey was found, Edwin Hall of Olathe, Kan., was charged with premeditated first-degree murder and aggravated kidnapping.

LIFE AFTER DEATH

Though many people would crawl into a corner and shy away from the ordeal, Lindsey is not afraid to talk about Kelsey.

Two weeks after the tragedy, Lindsey said she went back to working half days. She said she could not go some days because she had to drive by the cemetery where Kelsey's grave is, which she said could be seen from the street because of the decorations and donations.

Lindsey said she also received much recognition in Overland Park.

"Back home in Johnson County, my family and I can't go to the grocery store without somebody recognizing us," she said.

Many of these people recognized her and were secretive about their concern and questions. Lindsey said she also received and still receives that quiet recognition at K-State also.

"I could tell there were people who recognized me and were afraid to ask me something, but I would rather that somebody just come up and ask me a question than to hear people whispering about me as I walk by," she said.

"I have no problem talking about Kelsey. She was my sister and my best friend, and people can just ask me anything about her."

She is completely open at times about Kelsey but said she still has moments of weakness.

Lindsey said the hardest part of her life is going back to marching band and Kelsey not being in it. Kelsey was supposed to play in the clarinet section with Lindsey. It would have been their first year playing together.

"Before I go to marching band, I always have to take an anti-anxiety pill because I couldn't get through it otherwise," Lindsey said.

She said she never knows when she will have episodes of sadness.

"There are just times when just a whole bunch of little things that wouldn't normally set me off - I'll just blow up for no reason," she said.

She may have her bad days, but Lindsey said she has kept a hopeful and cheerful perspective on the past memories and the future. She said she has few memories about Kelsey, but they are special to her.

"Right now my dad and I are having the same problem where we can't really remember much about her at the moment," she said. "He said it's like a defense mechanism because if we were to remember everything now, we wouldn't be able to cope with life."

She still remembers much of the time and conversations with Kelsey, as well as Kelsey's infectious, cheerful demeanor. She said she remembers Kelsey coming up to visit her at K-State, going to dinners at the Kansas City Plaza and going to an after-school bonfire together.

"She was very vibrant, a go-getter, very opinionated and really - I guess feisty is the right word," Lindsey said. "She wasn't afraid to tell you what she thought, and she did it quite often."

She also remembers the times when Kelsey was less than agreeable.

"A lot of the times watching the news, they make her out to be this perfect girl next door, and she was, but she had her moments too where she could be the typical 18-year-old girl where drama filled her life," Lindsey said.

MAKING A DIFFERENCE

Lindsey Smith notices a difference in her demeanor these days.

"I'm more sociable actually because I kind of want to get out there and experience life more and live it to the fullest like Kelsey did," she said.

Hillmer said he also has changed in several ways since the tragedy. He said he has grown as a leader after organizing hundreds of people for the search for Kelsey.

He also said he learned to experience life fully and not sit back and mope about the loss.

"It's just one of those things that rocks your world, and you don't expect it to," he said. "And so it does give you an appreciation for how short life can be."

Hillmer also said he, much like Lindsey, has hope for the future prevention of tragedies like Kelsey's.

"I'm still hopeful a lot of good can come out of it," he said. "I don't know if the good can ever outweigh the bad that happened, but that's the goal."

Not long after the tragedy, a foundation called "Kelsey's Army" was organized in Kelsey's memory. Lindsey said the foundation's goal is to prevent future abductions by starting awareness classes and other fundraisers like motorcycle rides and golf tournaments that will raise awareness of abduction and rape.

The organization also helped create a way to continue her memory at K-State. At the San Jose State football game tomorrow, Lindsey said Kelsey's picture will be on the JumboTron for a moment of silence and remembrance.

Lindsey said the organization, run by Lindsey's father, was one of the fastest nonprofit organizations to be established after a tragedy like Kelsey's.

"We're trying to prevent any of this from happening to anyone else," Lindsey said, "because it's nothing you would even wish on your worst enemy."

Much like the slogan of the organization, "We are still here," Lindsey said Kelsey's family and friends still are living life mostly as they would with Kelsey in their lives. Lindsey said she will graduate in the fall, get married to her fiancé and carry on with life.

"You just got to go on with life when something like this happens," she said. "I know that if Kelsey were in my spot, she wouldn't stop her life, and that's not what she would have wanted for us."

Lindsey said she plans to tell her story to local high schools and hopes to teach teenage girls the risks of abduction and rape. She said she has learned several important precautions to avoid similar situations. She said she never talks on the phone when walking alone, always carries her keys in her hand and parks in lit areas.

Edwin Hall's trial will start Jan. 14, 2008. Lindsey said she was told the trial is one of the fastest to go to court. Until then, she has classes, a wedding and many other activities to worry about.

"There's all those things we have to do," she said. "If we don't go on with our lives, it's like Edwin Hall murder trial will start Jan. 14, 2008. Lindsey said she was told the trial is one of the fastest to go to court. Until then, she has classes, a wedding and many other activities to worry about.

FLOWERS | Brides pick seasonal arrangements

a fall wedding is a great time to take advantage of buds like dahlias, zinnias and day lilies, said Jennifer Baumann, writer for www.weddinggazette.com. All these fall buds come in colors like orange, purple, yellow, salmon and pink, so they can be used alone or in a mix.

"Fall is about interesting arrangements," Mellick said. "A lot of fall flowers come in many colors, so they can be arranged in fall hues."

Regardless of the flower type, compact hand-tied bouquets are definitely what is in right now, Mellick said.

And with so many options to choose from during the fall, a bride is sure to find something in her price range.

"Bridal bouquets generally run anywhere from $75 to $150, but we can do them cheaper, and we've done some that were more expensive," Mellick said. "It just depends on what the bride wants."

Most importantly, though, brides with fall weddings do not have to follow the same traditional rules as brides in other seasons, according to Celeste Perron, writer for www.theknot.com.

Mixing berries, leaves, branches and ivy into arrangements in the fall is completely acceptable, Perron said.

"Fall is about texture," Mellick said. "Brides want a lot of different kinds of flowers rather than just the rose bouquet. Spring is simple, fall is a big mixture."

So whichever flower becomes the focal point of a wedding, play up on the richness of the season. Autumn is all about different colors and textures within floral arrangements.

WEDDINGS | Bride's taste trumps tradition

variety to the traditional use of a white bride's dress. The Knot suggests deep colors, as well as pastels or electric colors for fall weddings, as long as there is balance between the bride's dress and the bridesmaids' dresses.

Some popular bridesmaid dress colors that are available at Weisner's include black, hazelnut, chocolate and claret, Edmondson said.

A popular style is a long strapless dress with a pick-up skirt. A pickup skirt has gathers all along the skirt of the gown. Another style is the tea-length dress, which is a shorter style that can be chosen for a bride or her bridesmaids.

Men's apparel for a wedding can be considered just as important as a bridesmaid dress. The common style for men is a basic tuxedo with a colored vest or tie.

"Most people tend to do a colored tie instead of a colored vest," Edmondson said.

Edmondson also said Weisner's has a variety of styles for grooms and their groomsmen.

"We have one couple who will be doing a hunter camo for vest and tie," she said.

Another important factor in weddings is the location of the wedding, as well as the reception.

"About 75 percent of weddings are in a church and the other 25 percent are all outside - maybe under a tent," said Scott Waters, owner of Waters Party and Wedding.

"Every once in a while you'll get something nontraditional, like in a house."

Waters said wedding receptions are usually held in a venue or reception hall.

Weddings are becoming more nontraditional, Waters said.

"Lately, in the past few years, people are getting away from traditional weddings," he said. "A lot more people are not getting married in churches."

Ceremonial traditions, such as the unity candle, are becoming more obsolete as well.

"The unity candle used to be a big thing," Waters said. "Now people are doing things like sand-pouring where sand is mixed together."

Several years ago, weddings were based on tradition, but traditions are changing. As time goes on, the trends are getting less followed as they were before," he said.

Today, it is usually based upon the bride's taste and her personal dreams.

"We try to tailor to the bride's taste," Mellick said. "We sit down with the bride and get a feel for her likes and dislikes and get a custom look just for her."

Wedding myths and traditions still should be considered in planning a wedding, but a bride's personal taste is just as important.

"With the bride's taste, anything goes," Mellick said. "We don't think so much of tradition anymore."

THE TRICK PLAY MASTER

Since his arrival in Manhattan, Ron Prince has become known for his ability to call a well-timed trick play. His trick plays can be traced back to his days as a coordinator at Virginia, but he's used them here – most notably against Texas and Auburn – with positive results.

OFF THE FIELD | PUNTER TIM REYER

Tim Reyer doesn't have a lot of free time, but he found enough to answer a few Off-the-Field questions. The senior punter quietly is moving up the K-State record books, and he had a few booming punts in the Wildcats' loss at Auburn. Growing up in Wamego, Reyer spent a lot of time kicking the football in his backyard, because as he put it, you can only spend so much time throwing a football at a tree. Reyer doesn't put Facebook high on his priority list, but he still manages to find some time to relax and play video games.

What are practices like for a punter?

Pretty relaxed. Under coach Snyder we used to get everything done first, and then we'd come in and watch TV for an hour. But now with coach Prince we have to stay out there the whole time. Last year we would play some games like try to kick the ball into a bucket down the field, but now we just hang out and talk.

Who would win a foot race, you or (kicker) Brooks Rossman?

I don't know, that kid's a little skinnier than me. I've never actually seen him sprint, but I think he might be a little faster.

What's your favorite thing to do in your free time?

If I have any free time, I like to play golf or play video games. I like to play Tiger Woods (PGA Tour 2008), but I don't know if it's my favorite. It's one of my favorites.

Do you just play sports video games?

Pretty much. I'm starting to get addicted to that FIFA (World Cup) right now. It's a pretty sweet game.

Do you have a dynasty going on NCAA Football 2007?

Yeah, I started a career or legends mode or whatever they call it, and I created a quarterback that's like 6-foot-6, 287 (pounds) or something like that.

How much time do you spend on Facebook in a typical week?

I look at it every once in a while ... I don't know. Last week I don't even think I looked at it.

What's the most annoying part about Facebook?

That news feed thing where it tells you about what every single person does. That's just really annoying.

Do you watch much TV?

I watch it a little bit. I used to have some shows I watched, but now I really don't. Right now I guess I watch the NFL Network for the previous games. I heard "Entourage" is good, but I don't have HBO.

What's the worst reality show you'll admit to watching?

(Laughing) Probably "The Hills." My girlfriend watches it a lot, so I'm kind of forced into it.

Who's the funniest player on the team?

Reggie Walker. He's just funny. He's kind of dumb, but he's funny.

What's the one talent you wish you had?

I guess I wish I could draw better, because I'm not an artist by any means at all. I can't draw to save my life.

What kind of music do you like?

Right now, just about anything except for classical. I can pretty much listen to anything, like reggae or whatever ... I don't know if I always have a favorite. Sometimes it'll be rap, sometimes it'll be country.

What's the last CD you bought or downloaded?

Probably T.I. I don't remember the name of the album. I think it was like "Grand Hustle" or something.

What's your favorite place to eat in Manhattan?

Probably La Fiesta. I like to get the enchilada combo.

SAN JOSE STATE

OFFENSE

K-State must improve its running game and minimize the 3rd-and-long situations that led to nine punts against Auburn. Arizona State torched San Jose State for 250 rushing yards last week, so this could be a good chance for K-State's running game to make its season debut. If quarterback Josh Freeman is able to cut his 57 pass attempts in half, the K-State offense should have fewer problems.

There's a lot of room for improvement for the Spartans after gaining only 115 total yards and seven first downs against Arizona State. After a productive 2006 season, quarterback Adam Tafralis completed five of 13 passes in the opener. As bad as the air attack was, the running game might have been worse. Starting tailback Yonus Davis sprained an ankle and is out for Saturday's game.

DEFENSE

The Wildcats' defense had an impressive debut against Auburn, allowing only 62 rushing yards and intercepting two passes. They had no trouble getting to the quarterback, and overall the unit looked significantly faster than it did a year ago. The only chink in the armor seemed to be a tendency to give up the big play. But against San Jose State's struggling offense, the K-State defense should continue to impose its will and dominate the line of scrimmage.

Not much went right for the San Jose State defense last week, as it gave up 520 total yards. San Jose State couldn't stop the Arizona State offense, and the Spartan defense spent most of the game on the field. With that said, San Jose State's defense isn't lacking playmakers. A big play or two from cornerback Dwight Lowery — who was listed as a preseason All-American by several publications — would help.

SPECIAL TEAMS

Kicker Brooks Rossman and punter Tim Reyer played a huge role in K-State's near-upset at Auburn. Rossman was 2-for-2 in his debut as the starting kicker, and Reyer averaged 44.7 yards per punt. The kick return team showed flashes of last season and often gave the offense good field position. It wouldn't be a surprise if the Wildcats got a special teams touchdown this week.

With an offense that was stifled last week, field position could make or break the Spartans' chances at an upset. Field-goal opportunities and punts cannot be squandered. Kicker Jared Strubeck — a member of the Lou Groza Award watch list — will be pivotal if the game is tight in the fourth quarter. If the K-State defense has its way, though, it won't come down to a late field goal.

PREDICTION

The Spartans definitely have their work cut out for them against K-State. But don't discredit the chances of an upset. After all, this is a team that went 9-4 last season and won the New Mexico Bowl. They even took Boise State to the wire, almost ending the Broncos' perfect season. In the end, though, the Wildcats just need to avoid beating themselves. If the Wildcats play to their ability, there shouldn't be much of a problem.

ANALYSIS

Steady ground game a constant in Wildcats' victories

By Ryne Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nearly every offensive player used a certain phrase at Monday's football press conference: "Pass to score, run to win."

It's a philosophy coach Ron Prince has rooted into his offensive unit, one that he feels is paramount to being a consistent team. In order to hold a lead late in the game, a team must be able to punish the opponent on the ground. K-State was unable to do that in its 23-13 loss at Auburn, and it cost dearly.

The saying might be new this season, but it held true for the majority of 2006. In Prince's short time at K-State, the Wildcats are 5-1 when they rush more than they pass. The only loss came last season against Missouri, when K-State's running game rolled late and Leon Patton and James Johnson both finished with more than 100 yards.

Under Prince's guidance, the Wildcats are 2-6 when they attempt more passes than runs. One of those victories came against Marshall last season, when former quarterback Dylan Meier led an air attack that totaled 35 passes for 256 yards.

The other pass-happy victory was more notable: K-State's 45-42 upset of Texas last season. In that game the Wildcats passed 34 times, compared to only 25 rushes. The 45 points tied for the most K-State scored all of last season.

The final 2006 statistics show that in K-State's victories, the team averaged 130.1 rushing yards per game on 30.9 attempts, an average of 4.2 yards a carry. When the Wildcats lost, they ran for only 97.7 yards a game on 26 carries (3.8 yards per attempt).

Passing differed a little bit as well. In wins they averaged 208 yards per game and 8.1 yards per attempt. In losses, they only averaged 190.8 yards per game and 4.9 yards per attempt. That is a 3.2-yard drop off between wins and losses.

So clearly the Wildcats have a better winning percentage when running the ball more than throwing it, but for the team to be successful, it needs to execute both the pass and the run in each game.

Why did the Wildcats come out against Auburn and throw the ball 58 times and only rush 16 times for 27 yards?

A lot of it has to do with offensive scheming and where Prince and his offensive coordinator see the weakness in the opponent's defense.

"I'm more interested in being able to move the ball than trying to go out and prove a point that we can run the ball," Prince said.

They seemingly saw a weakness in Auburn's secondary and tried to expose it. The players understood that the game plan was to pass, which is why the running game seemed to get neglected.

"I think it will depend on the opponent," said wide receiver Jordy Nelson. "Auburn had a great run defense, so coach emphasized that we're going to try to throw the ball to beat them, and that's what we did."

The game plan also can change in the middle of games. Nelson said every coach wants to go into a game and be balanced.

"If you go into a game thinking all you're going to do is pass, they're going to be able to just go off on you and bring the pass rush," he said. "We wanted to be able to run the ball, which they did a good job through-

Running back James Johnson sheds a tackle during K-State's game at Auburn. Johnson finished with just 14 yards on seven carries. In the last 14 games, the Wildcats are 6-2 when they call more running plays than passing plays.

out the game not allowing us to do that, but we wanted to keep it moving, get the ball out of (quarterback Josh Freeman's) hand, move the pocket so they weren't able to just come and get him."

Still, the Wildcats win when they run the ball more and become a more balanced team. This Saturday against San Jose State, they have a chance to prove it.

"They're a totally different team, and we're going to have to get a whole new game plan for them," said offensive tackle Nick Stringer, "but if we get a good balance we're gonna do a good job."

Stringer said he wants to run the ball more because he wants to prove they can.

"If we start out running the ball well, it's going to lead to a lot more runs during the course of the game," he said.

If they do that then, statistically speaking, they have a better chance to win, but not all players want to run the ball more.

When asked if he enjoyed the 58 pass plays, wide receiver Deon Murphy smiled.

"I'd love to do it every single week," he said. "I'd love to pass 60 times, but that is just something that's gonna come from coach — play calling."

Offensive line shows progress in conditioning as it prepares for home opener

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

Offensive tackle Alesana Alesana tries to block Auburn defensive end Antonio Coleman during K-State's game last Saturday. The unit has been under much scrutiny since coach Ron Prince — a former offensive line coach at Virginia — took over last season. Alesana is one of a few new faces along the Wildcats' line this season.

By Joel Jellison
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Prior to K-State's game against Auburn last Saturday, offensive tackle Nick Stringer pulled aside newcomer Alesana Alesana to offer some advice.

"I told him, 'No matter what happens, keep fighting,'" said Stringer, a returning Freshman All-Big 12 selection. "It's not always going to be perfect. Do what you do best. You go out and practice against great players every day. It's nothing different."

But for Alesana it was different.

He struggled on the field, getting tagged four times for false-start penalties and allowing a sack in the final minutes of a game that resulted in a fumble return for touchdown.

It was the first Division-I game for Alesana, a junior-college transfer and Western Samoa native.

Still, it was a good performance from the offensive line, a unit that was one of K-State coach Ron Prince's biggest concerns entering the season.

"On the line we graded out pretty well," Prince said. "From understanding what they were going to try to do, we didn't have very many busts at all as far as mental errors. We were on top of it from a scheme standpoint."

The offensive line gave quarterback Josh Freeman plenty of time to throw against Auburn, a defense that's had a history of being among the nation's best. Freeman completed 32 of 57 pass attempts for 268 yards and was sacked only twice.

"I felt like they did a good job," Freeman said. "Alesana's first game out, I have no complaints about how he played. He went out and did his best, and that's all we can ask."

Stringer praised the play of his fellow linemen. Considering the inexperience of some of the members on the line and the pressure of playing a big game in a hostile road environment, he felt they held up well.

"It's our first game," Stringer said. "We had a lot of guys who it was their first game, first start. It's tough to go from not playing to playing in front of 90,000 people, so there was a lot of pressure on a lot of guys."

Other than pressure and inexperience, the issue for the line was making sure everyone knew their blocking assignments. Center Jordan Bedore said the line did a nice job of playing together, but added it was no easy task.

"It was a challenge making sure we were all on the same page, to get the calls down the line, but we did a good job and we're going to have to do that again in games throughout the season," Bedore said.

Bedore said he felt the offensive line showed progress with conditioning, as not many Wildcats had their arms on their hips, winded or out of breath.

"I thought our conditioning was great out there," Bedore said. "We were able to push into the fourth quarter, and we need to continue to get better at conditioning so we can take over games in the fourth."

The only terrible moment for the offensive line seemed to come in the fourth quarter when the offense went into the two-minute drill following Auburn's touchdown to take the lead.

Auburn blew through the left side of the line and sacked Freeman, leading to a fumble return for a touchdown. Despite that, Freeman has plenty of trust in the offensive line.

"They may be young and not very experienced, but they got passion for their position and they go out and work hard every day," Freeman said. "I got all the confidence in the world in those guys."

Seeming increase in trick plays at college level intrigues fans

By Jeffrey Rake
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It only took Boise State three out-of-this-world plays for it all to come together, for the small-school team from the state known not for its athletics but for its potatoes, to become sports icons and perhaps the most talked about team of the 21st century.

Three trick plays, all against Oklahoma in the 2007 Fiesta Bowl, helped Boise State win its first BCS Bowl game while America watched and fell in love with the team from Idaho.

Before the trick plays, Boise State was best known for having a blue field — the unusual color of the Astro Play turf at Bronco Stadium.

Now the school is suddenly intriguing, like one of those moon hoax theories or a Paris Hilton TV interview.

Type in the words "Boise State football" at www.youtube.com, and you'll have more than 170 video options to choose from. Most all of them, by the way, are of trick plays.

Stop by a gaming store and pick up a copy of "NCAA Football 2008" and you'll see Jared Zabransky, the team's former quarterback, gracing the cover.

The attention, the interest in Boise State football has become so overwhelming that head coach Chris Peterson reportedly began a recent press conference by saying he'd be happy to address any "non-Fiesta Bowl questions."

So when K-State coach Ron Prince called for a trick play against Auburn last Saturday — a quick screen pass from Josh Freeman to Jordy Nelson, who then fired across field to Leon Patton in the end zone — it should have been no surprise that commentator Ed Cunningham quipped, "Is this Kansas State or Boise State?"

As luck would have it, one of the stars from that Fiesta Bowl win, Vinny Perretta, happened to be watching the game on ESPN from his home in Idaho.

Perretta, a wide receiver, threw a touchdown pass on a 4th-down make-or-break play in the Fiesta Bowl, the one that set up the winning score which came by way of, you guessed it, a trick play.

He had been flipping through the channels — watching mostly Tennessee play California — when he turned to the K-State game.

Just in time, too. He saw the whole play, everything from the snap to Freeman to the on-field celebration that ensued shortly after Patton caught the pass along the right sideline.

What did Perretta, one of the masters of the trick play, think of it?

Well, he certainly gave the effort some nice remarks.

"I like that play. I think we might add it to our playbook," he said. "It's college football at its best when things like that work out."

PRINCE'S TRICKS BEGAN AT VIRGINIA

Before Prince revealed his first trick play in Manhattan, before Texas, before Auburn, before any of that, he was an offensive coordinator at Virginia.

He took over for Bill Musgrave, who left for the National Football League in 2002 to take the same position with the Jacksonville Jaguars. Musgrave had a reputation of being a fearless coordinator, one who was always willing to try a few trick plays. But after he departed, the trickery at Virginia seemingly disappeared.

That was until an Oct. 15, 2005, game against Florida State, when Prince turned nearly every offensive player he had into a quarterback. Three different times a wide receiver or running back threw a pass. All of the plays failed, with one of them nearly resulting in an interception, but Virginia still pulled off the upset and won, 26-21.

Prince left Virginia and arrived at K-State later that year, taking his trick plays with him and leaving Virginia with an offense that finished 113th out of 119 teams in total offense in 2006.

"Let's just say they're seldom unveiled," said Doug Doughty, Virginia beat writer at the Roanoke Times, of the trick plays once employed by Prince. "It's interesting to hear that Prince has been utilizing trick plays, because they've essentially disappeared from the UVA playbook."

K-STATE BENEFITS FROM UNCONVENTIONAL PLAYS

Prince's first play call as K-State's coach in 2006 hinted at his inner aggressiveness. He called for a deep pass in the season opener against Illinois State, a pass that was intercepted and later converted into a field goal.

The unwanted outcome didn't deter Prince from being unconventional. He tried a nifty wide receiver reverse a week later against Florida Atlantic, opened the Marshall game with an onside kick and tried a fake punt against Nebraska — from his own 9-yard line.

"It's something that, if it works it looks great," senior Jordy Nelson said. "If not, you kind of get questioned."

There wasn't much questioning going on after the Nov. 11, 2006, game against Texas, where back-to-back trick plays helped K-State to a 45-42 win. It was an arrival of sorts for Prince, who up until that game had received some criticism for his "bold and daring" approach to coaching.

It wouldn't be the last time Prince would try consecutive trick plays. Patton's touchdown reception last week against Auburn came on the heels of an attempted trick play that was blown dead because of a false start penalty.

"Nobody really ever expects back-to-back trick plays, and the thing about our personnel on offense is we've got a lot of guys who can do a lot of things — like Leon Patton, James Johnson and Jordy," quarterback Josh Freeman said. "It gives us an added dimension on offense. We can call a trick play from anywhere."

So why, exactly, do coaches like Prince call trick plays? Reggie Walker, K-State's senior linebacker, said it's all about taking advantage of the defense and trying to expose a weakness. And when a trick play goes for a touchdown, as it did against Auburn, there's no telling how much the momentum of a game can swing.

"When you score on a trick play, of course it's going to bring everybody's morale up," Walker said. "Coach Prince was getting happy with us. I saw him jumping up and down like he was 20 years old again. It was fun."

AMERICA'S OBSESSION WITH TRICKS

Perretta said he doesn't know for sure why America has fallen in love with trick plays, or why Boise State has had such a strong following since the Fiesta Bowl. Still, he's confident enough to make an educated guess.

"I think with the Fiesta Bowl, it kind of attracted fans to us," Perretta said. "It was an exciting finish, and we ran three trick plays. It gives the fans something to cheer about. It gives fans a chance to cheer for the underdog."

Tom Dienhart, a college football expert for The Sporting News, said he doesn't think trick plays necessarily have changed the game. Nor does he feel they are being used more today.

He does, however, believe they are getting recognized more often because of the increased attention.

Patton's touchdown, for instance, has appeared on ESPN's "Top Plays" and has been replayed several times since Saturday's game with Auburn. Yet, that doesn't mean trick plays are any less impressive when they happen to work.

"In K-State's situation at Auburn, it really had nothing to lose," Dienhart said. "I credit Prince for trying something different to win what would have been a big game."

The volume of trick plays that coaches will use in the years ahead are unknown. There's no official statistic on trick plays, making it difficult to spot trends.

If it were up to Perretta, though, he'd like to see more of them. He said he thinks the plays can be exciting for any fan base, regardless of what team they are rooting for.

Whether it be Boise State fans in the Pacific Northwest or Wildcats fans here in Manhattan, he thinks the plays bring an element of excitement to the game.

"I believe trick plays have helped college football," Perretta said. "As long as you don't break the rules, you can do anything."

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

BIG 12 UPDATE

BAYLOR BEARS

Week one result: 27-0 loss at TCU.

What went right: The game stopped at the end of the fourth quarter. Seriously, the Bears did produce as many first downs (16) as the Horned Frogs, they were just unable to put any points on the board and went 0-for-2 in the red zone.

What went wrong: Baylor quarterbacks threw four interceptions, and if the spread offense is going to work in Waco, Texas, the Bears have to avoid the turnovers. The defense couldn't stop the TCU attack, giving up 200 rushing yards and 205 passing yards.

Week two outlook: Baylor returns home to face Rice, a significantly weaker opponent than No. 19 TCU. If the Bears are going to have any success this season, they need to get their air attack going. If that doesn't happen against a team like Rice, it could be another long season.

COLORADO BUFFALOES

Week one result: 31-28 overtime victory over Colorado State.

What went right: The Buffaloes won, something they did only twice last season. Besides that, quarterback Cody Hawkins threw for 201 yards and two touchdowns, and running back Demetrius Sumler averaged 5.3 yards per carry on 16 attempts.

What went wrong: Colorado was out-rushed and out-passed by Colorado State. The Buffaloes also had seven fewer first downs than Colorado State but still snuck by with the victory.

Week two outlook: Colorado will take on Arizona State, an opponent less likely to allow the Buffaloes a last-minute victory. Arizona State dominated San Jose State in its first game and has been labeled a possible surprise team in the Pac-10 Conference. The win for the Buffaloes is nice, but they still have a lot to prove.

IOWA STATE CYCLONES

Week one result: 23-14 loss vs. Kent State.

What went right: Cyclone running back J.J. Bass rushed for 106 yards in the first half. He finished the game with 133 yards and a touchdown. Quarterback Bret Meyer completed 14-of-23 passes for 148 yards. Meyer's target was again wide receiver Todd Blythe, who recorded 65 yards.

What went wrong: The Cyclones managed to get into the red zone just twice. Kent State drove into the red zone five times and took advantage of the opportunities. Iowa State kicker Bret Culbertson missed both field goals he attempted in the game.

Week two outlook: The Cyclones will try to rebound at home against in-state rival Northern Iowa. Meyer will need to lead his team to the red zone more than twice to pull out the win. Bass will also need to stay sharp, rushing for more than 100 yards.

KANSAS JAYHAWKS

Week one result: 52-7 win vs. Central Michigan.

What went right: Kansas' offense was dominant against Central Michigan, recording five passing touchdowns and one rushing touchdown. The Jayhawk quarterbacks completed 74.3 percent of their passes and totaled 308 yards through the air. The ground attack was almost as successful, recording 230 yards.

What went wrong: Jayhawk coach Mark Mangino almost exploded. Raim Pendleton dove into the end zone after a 77-yard punt return and was charged with a 15-yard penalty. Other than that, Kansas had little to complain about.

Week two outlook: The Jayhawks will come out of the dream world they are in eventually, but not yet. Kansas will face Southeastern Louisiana and should rely on its running game to take down its opponent. The biggest thing to look forward to: it's Band Day at the stadium.

KANSAS STATE WILDCATS

Week one result: 23-13 loss at Auburn.

What went right: K-State quarterback Josh Freeman showed poise in the pocket and completed 32 passes for 268 yards through the air. The K-State defense controlled the Tigers' running game, holding them to 62 yards.

What went wrong: Jordy Nelson threw the only touchdown of the game. The Wildcats' offensive line had a lot to do with the team's loss and was a big reason why they couldn't come back at the end. K-State also drove into the red zone only once.

Week two outlook: K-State will face San Jose State at home Saturday and is eager for a second chance after a disappointing Auburn game. The Wildcats could probably make a few mistakes and still come out on top. If the team plays as well as it did last week, there shouldn't be any trouble dominating the Spartans.

MISSOURI TIGERS

Week one result: 40-34 victory over Illinois.

What went right: Chase Daniel showed everyone what he is capable of. The quarterback completed 37-of-54 passes and didn't throw an interception. Daniel totaled 359 yards in the air, complemented by three end-zone strikes.

What went wrong: Coach Gary Pinkel confused almost everyone watching the game by going for a two-point conversion with the Tigers up seven in the first half. After the game, Pinkel said his card told him it was the right decision. Two days later, the often-criticized coach admitted he was wrong.

Week two outlook: The Tigers will travel to Ole Miss to take on the Rebels. Missouri won the matchup in Columbia, Mo., last season. Daniel has established himself as one of the top pure passers in the Big 12 — if not the nation — and the Tigers will likely go as far as Daniel carries them.

NEBRASKA CORNHUSKERS

Week one result: 52-10 win vs. Nevada.

What went right: Marlon Lucky rushed for 233 yards and scored three touchdowns to demolish Nevada. To top it off, Lucky added 33 yards receiving. The Cornhuskers tallied 625 total yards as a team in the contest, marking their highest total since 2001.

What went wrong: Nevada only scored one touchdown in the game and it was because Nebraska quarterback Sam Keller threw an interception. Nevada's Jonathan Amaya returned the interception 80 yards for the score.

Week two outlook: Nebraska might have skated through its first game of the season, but the future will hold some tougher tests. The Cornhuskers face Wake Forest on the road, a team with more on the line than Nevada. Wake Forest is coming off a tight 38-28 loss against Boston College and would love to upset Nebraska.

OKLAHOMA SOONERS

Week one result: 79-10 win vs. North Texas.

What went right: Almost everything. Quarterback Sam Bradford went 20-of-22 for 350 yards and three touchdowns — in the first half. Freshman running back DeMarco Murray set an Oklahoma record by scoring five touchdowns in his debut.

What went wrong: The Sooners gave up 232 yards through the air. That's nothing to be ashamed of, but the pass defense will need to get cleaned up before the start of the Big 12 season. After all, the Sooners have Texas Tech, Oklahoma State and Missouri on the conference slate.

Week two outlook: Oklahoma faces Miami at home in the sixth matchup between the two storied programs. They last met in the 1988 Orange Bowl, with the Hurricanes winning 20-14. The Sooners will try to end a three-game losing streak to Miami.

OKLAHOMA STATE COWBOYS

Week one result: 35-14 loss at Georgia.

What went right: The Cowboys hung with the No. 13 Bulldogs through the first half and trailed only 21-14 at the break. Wide receiver Adarius Bowman proved why he was garnering so much preseason hype with a 20-yard touchdown catch in the first quarter.

What went wrong: Oklahoma State couldn't muster anything in the second half. The offensive line failed to protect quarterback Bobby Reid, allowing five sacks and 11 tackles for loss.

Week two outlook: It will be a significant decrease in competition for the Cowboys, who welcome Florida Atlantic to Stillwater, Okla. The Owls are coming off a 27-14 win over Middle Tennessee State but will be in for a rude awakening when the Cowboys try to get their high-powered offense rolling.

TEXAS LONGHORNS

Week one result: 21-13 win vs. Arkansas State.

What went right: Colt McCoy fired a 35-yard touchdown pass to Limas Sweed on the Longhorns' opening drive. The Longhorns defense tallied four sacks and nine tackles for loss.

What went wrong: Arkansas State marched into the red zone six times. Lucky for the Longhorns, Arkansas State only converted twice. Texas committed 10 penalties for 90 yards. The Longhorns totaled 57 fewer yards than Arkansas State. If Texas makes a habit of giving up so many yards, its loss column will fill up.

Week two outlook: Texas will be host to TCU, but will need to play better this week to come out with a victory. TCU is coming off a win of its own and is prepared to take on Texas. Chants of "We want Texas," filled TCU's stadium as the Horned Frogs polished off Baylor 27-0.

TEXAS A&M AGGIES

Week one result: 38-7 win vs. Montana State.

What went right: Texas A&M quarterback Stephen McGee passed for 112 yards and rushed for 121 yards. He controlled the Montana State defense, leading the Aggies to 390 total yards, with 261 of those coming on the ground.

What went wrong: Kerry Franks returned two kicks for 82 yards with a long of 44 yards. Franks should be able to do better. He is clearly not trying hard enough and needs to be benched if he does not improve. Texas A&M actually did nothing wrong in the game, just one measly interception.

Week two outlook: The Aggies will be host to Fresno State in College Station, Texas, and might present a challenge. The Bulldogs had a good 2006 season and beat Sacramento State 24-3 in their opener. However, the Aggies have looked really good dating back to last season, and College Station is the Home of the 12th Man.

TEXAS TECH RED RAIDERS

Week one result: 49-9 win at SMU.

What went right: The offense looked to be in good shape despite losing several starters. Quarterback Graham Harrell passed for 419 yards and four touchdowns. After losing his starting receivers, Harrell's new favorite target might be redshirt freshman Michael Crabtree, who caught 12 passes for 106 yards and three touchdowns.

What went wrong: The Red Raiders got off to a bit of a slow start and led by just 11 points until late in the second quarter. The team also was called for 10 penalties, which could have cost it had it been a closer game.

Week two outlook: In week two Texas Tech will be host to UTEP, a team that squeaked by New Mexico 10-6. The Red Raiders undoubtedly will present more of a test for the UTEP defense. Texas Tech has won the last four meetings between the schools, dating back to 1963.

Wide receiver transfer Murphy inspired by pro players, family values, attention

By Nick Dunn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When Deon Murphy stepped on the field at Jordan-Hare Stadium for K-State's game at Auburn last Saturday, it marked the beginning of his next step as a football player. His days at Coffeyville (Kan.) Community College were a distant memory. Now he was under the bright lights, a place he belonged, playing on ESPN in front of a packed SEC stadium.

The nerves, as Murphy knew they would, were gone after the opening kickoff. The fans, the cameras — even the noise — all took a backseat. He knew his family was watching back home in Houston, and he wanted to make them proud. Suddenly it was just football, the game he'd been surrounded by his entire life. It's a game he grew up studying, watching, and most importantly, playing.

The game on Saturday was nothing spectacular for Murphy. He reeled in five receptions. Most of Auburn's punts forced him into fair catches. K-State led for the majority of the second half but couldn't hold on at the end, falling 23-13.

After the game he talked to his father, Daryl Murphy, just like he has after every game in his collegiate career. Deon wanted to know what Daryl thought, how his routes looked, if there was anything he could have done better. Daryl Murphy's advice isn't like a lot of others' advice, though. He was a high-school football coach in Texas for 18 years.

PRO MENTORS

Deon always wanted to be a part of his dad's football teams. He'd watch game film with his dad, asking him about certain plays. He'd go to practices, and when he was big enough, he became the team's ball boy. If Deon had one passion as a kid, it was football.

"Deon always loved football," Daryl said. "I tried to give him as much exposure as I could. He was always inquisitive. He'd always want to ask questions — why this and why that."

"He can be a student of the game. He knows the game because he's been around it all his life."

Learning from his dad was one thing, but learning from the players was another. His father coached a number of future NFL stars, including Dante Hall, Keenan McCardell, Jason Glenn and Derrick Vaughn. Being around players like that, Deon said, helped keep him humble and gave him the confidence he has today.

Deon was particularly close with Glenn, who has played line-backer for the New York Jets, Miami Dolphins and Minnesota Vikings. He used to carry Glenn's shoulder pads and talk with him on the bus on the way to road games.

"(Those players) continue to talk to and encourage Deon," Daryl said. "Jason would always tell Deon, 'Stay strong, man. Keep doing what you're doing. You've got a lot of ability.'"

In a lot of ways, though, Deon is most similar to Hall. Hall — now a member of the St. Louis Rams — became famous in 2003 when he had five return touchdowns for the Kansas City Chiefs. The similarities between Deon and Hall are obvious. Both are return specialists. Both play slot receiver. And both are a bit undersized.

"He could be (a role model)," Deon said. "I would say that. It was just a regular friendship, though, just talking on a day-to-day basis."

"We're real close. I talked to him a couple weeks ago. Everything he tells me just keeps me confident on the field."

A SUPPORTIVE MOM

Gwen Murphy loves to see her son play football. She and Daryl still try to make it to as many of Deon's games as they can. In fact, they plan on coming to a few of K-State's home games as well as the Wildcats' games at Texas and Oklahoma State. But even if she's there, Daryl can't guarantee she'll see everything.

"She always gets a little nervous," Daryl said. "She likes to watch him and see him participate, but sometimes she's so nervous she can't sit still."

In one of Deon's games at Klein Forest High School, his team trailed by 25 points in the fourth quarter, but there was still plenty of excitement left. Klein Forest eventually battled back into the game, and Deon scored the winning touchdown.

Gwen was there, but she didn't see it.

"She was so nervous she had gone downstairs," Daryl said, laughing. "She couldn't watch the game."

Though Deon is hundreds of miles away from his parents, they still remain close. It was his parents, after all, who raised him to be the man he is today.

"We always have told Deon and continue to tell Deon, 'You always give thanks to where your talent came from,'" Daryl said. "'Don't you ever forget that. You give praise and honor to God, because that's where you got all those abilities.' And he understands that."

TIME FOR JOKES, SERIOUSNESS

It doesn't take much effort to get a smile out of Deon Murphy. And he doesn't have to work too hard to get everyone around him smiling, either.

"You're always going to get the real Deon, 24/7," Deon said. "As a matter of fact, 25/8 ... No matter what day it is, what time it is, you're going to get the real Deon."

It's part of the way he looks at life. He's an entertainer. He likes to keep smiles on everybody's faces. It's the way he's always been.

"Deon's always been the funny man in our family," Daryl said. "He's always been real facetious to us all. He knows when to get serious, but he likes to entertain."

Once when Deon was younger, he was wrestling with his older brother, Damien. Deon accidentally hit Damien in the stomach, and his brother played like he was seriously hurt and almost dying. Deon, Daryl said, got really scared and took off running to find his parents because he was so worried about his brother.

That story, Daryl said, described Deon in a nutshell. He always loved to have a good time, but he knew when to get serious, and he cares deeply about his family.

In his short time at K-State, Deon already has taken over the role of entertainer on the team. In the rookie show, he had a rap that had his teammates laughing for days afterward.

Deon is on one end of the spectrum when it comes to personalities. Fellow wide receiver Jordy Nelson is on the other. The two were described by coach Ron Prince as polar opposites.

"He's definitely outgoing, which is good," Nelson said. "Everyone's different around here. He'll keep the mood going."

Deon's take: "I respect him. We're getting closer by the day. He likes to keep it a little quiet, but I like to liven things up. I like to make the game fun — kind of like something Chad Johnson does, but I'm not Chad Johnson. I'm Deon Murphy."

LOOKING FORWARD

His first game behind him, Deon sat in the Vanier Football Complex on Tuesday in sweats and a T-shirt. It was easy to tell he was still a bit upset about K-State letting the last game get away. But it didn't dim his hopes for the rest of the season.

"We're going to make it to the Big 12 Championship," he said. "I feel it now."

As for his personal game, he admitted to feeling a little shocked by the size and speed of the players around him. It certainly is an adjustment, but now that his first game is under his belt, he believes it will be downhill from here.

"I can't wait for this weekend," he said. "We're going to finish this game. (The fans) are going to see a faster Deon Murphy, a much stronger Deon Murphy, a much more poised Deon Murphy. I'm used to the atmosphere now. I'm ready to go this weekend."

We've got the stories you've got to read.

San Jose State coach remains positive despite opening-week blowout

By Adam Ashmore
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

San Jose State coach Dick Tomey and his team ran into some trouble in last week's opener against Arizona State.

The Spartans lost 45-3 and failed to put together anything positive on either side of the ball. Tomey, forever the optimist, wasn't willing to sugarcoat the performance. Not after his team only managed 115 yards of total offense and gave up 520 yards on defense.

"We ran into a hornet's nest last week," Tomey said. "We coached bad and played bad and didn't compete."

K-State coach Ron Prince, however, is unwilling to acknowledge that his team will have an easy opponent. The Wildcats, coming off a 23-13 loss at Auburn, find themselves with an 0-1 record for the first time since 1989. The team cannot afford to take any opponent lightly, Prince said.

"I don't think the score of the game Saturday is any indication of how they've played in the past and how they're going to come in here and play," Prince said. "We've been very focused on that."

San Jose State finished 9-4 last season, punctuated by a victory in the New Mexico Bowl. The Spartans return starting senior quarterback Adam Tafralis, who set a school record last year in completion percentage.

Though they were blown out in their first game of the season and are heavy underdogs against K-State, Tomey said he's thrilled with the opportunity to play some tougher teams. He thinks it will better prepare his team for what's ahead.

"I'm so grateful we have these two games to start with instead of playing two teams that we might be superior to, because we'll find out more about ourselves," Tomey said.

San Jose State had plenty of competition last season, playing teams like Hawaii, Boise State and San Diego State — all bowl participants. The Spartans almost ended Boise State's undefeated season, losing in the final minutes of the game to the Broncos, 23-20.

The San Jose State players do not plan to let last week's game have any effect on their morale against the Wildcats. In fact, the Spartans hope they can look back on it and chalk it up to experience.

"I think you have to identify the good things that happened," Tomey said. "We're going to learn a lot about ourselves, and in the meantime,

San Jose State coach Dick Tomey, who is fourth among active coaches in career wins, leads his team out on the field before a game. Tomey led the Spartans to their first bowl game in 16 seasons last year with a 9-4 overall record.

we're going to do everything we can to give ourselves a chance to win."

The Spartans, Prince said, have plenty of personnel who have caught his eye.

"I'm concerned about the size San Jose State has on their offensive line and the hard-hitting playmakers they have in their secondary," Prince said.

After such an offensive struggle in the opener against Arizona State, Tomey said he knows his team will have to run the ball effectively against K-State if they want to have a chance. He knows it won't be easy. The Wildcat defense allowed just 62 yards rushing last week against Auburn.

"Our challenge is to try to find a way to run the ball," Tomey said. "But we've got to be able to run and throw. We need to find a way to win regardless of what it requires."

Wildcats' confident attitude is just what team needs to return to former dominance

Everyone has seen pictures of coach Ron Prince staring off into the distance with his stoic, confident look.

Because of that look, some have labeled Prince as egotistical or overconfident. To me, it is the perfect look.

It truly epitomizes what a football coach should be: fearless, strong-willed and a great leader. Prince brings those attributes to his team.

This K-State team has a swagger to it.

The players believe they are good enough to control their own destiny. When talking about the Auburn game, the players said it was their fault they lost, not that Auburn took it from them.

"We blew it," Reggie Walker said.

"I personally believe we had the game won," Jordy Nelson said. "We lost it ourselves." Confidence is the unde-niable attitude K-State has. Watching Walker and the defense celebrate every vicious hit and stuff a Southeastern Conference offense for most of the game brought flashbacks to the glory years of K-State football.

However, it still wasn't enough to satisfy them because they didn't earn a "W" in the standings.

After the game, it looked as if Walker was about to explode because of the game's outcome. Nelson was snapping a towel toward the ground before a radio interview. Smiles were sparse at best.

These Wildcats want to win badly. The best thing about it is that they are capable of winning. Anyone who watched the game last Saturday realizes K-State is scary-close to becoming the Wildcats of old.

For two seasons before Prince arrived, the players didn't seem to care as much as this year's team. Yes, I am basing this off one game, but the passion they have displayed so far on and off the field is a great sign.

This team believes it can compete with anyone and the players are not satisfied with where they are right now.

One player that has already demonstrated this in a game is quarterback Josh Freeman.

Stat-wise, he had an OK to bad game, with two picks and a fumble that was returned for a touchdown. But during his 32-of-57, 268-yard performance, he demonstrated a poise that was lacking during the losses to Kansas and Rutgers at the end of last season.

On one play, the ball was knocked out of his hand near the K-State goal line, but Freeman calmly picked up the ball and threw a first-down strike to Daniel Gonzalez. During the game he was taking hit after hit, and he stood tall the whole game.

He has grown as a player in the offseason, and it looks as if the team has as well. These Wildcats are ready for the big time. They just have to do it on the field.

Last Week Leon Patton and the K-State rushing attack only managed to gain 27 yards on the ground. Running the ball was just one of a handful of questions that remains to be answered this week.

K-State must answer 5 questions to seal a win at Snyder Family Stadium

Can the penalties be held to a minimum?

The main reason why K-State lost at Auburn was penalties. The team totaled 16 penalties for 141 yards. The penalties stalled drives, extended Auburn drives and made coach Ron Prince yell - a lot. The false starts should be solved this week since they are at home. If not, K-State has a problem. Also, K-State needs to bring its tackling down, away from the head. Too many facemasks were called. Even though some were questionable, tackling shouldn't even be that close to a player's helmet. Prince probably made penalties a major focus this week, so fans might see less penalties Saturday.

Can K-State run the ball?

K-State ran the ball 16 times for a total of 27 yards. That is an average of 1.7 yards per carry. A lot of the players said they knew beforehand they were going to throw a lot, but when the fourth quarter came it would have been nice to have a consistent ground attack. K-State has two very good running backs who can make game-breaking plays with their legs, but they have to have the ball in their hands in order to make those plays. A running game is also a good way to control the clock.

Can the offensive line hold up the whole game?

The offensive linemen played well for most of the game, but they were helped somewhat by offensive coordinator James Franklin calling plays that didn't require a lot of protection. He called lots of short, quick passes and did a good job of moving the pocket. The line posted a good dropback-sack ratio, but quarterback Josh Freeman was still hit numerous times. Late in the fourth quarter, Auburn's defense started controlling the line of scrimmage. Quentin Groves had his way, and he caused the vicious hit that made Freeman fumble. But then again, Groves has made a lot of offensive lines look bad.

Can the defense get the one big stop?

The defense showed a load of potential, but it is missing one key element: killer instinct. The Wildcats had a chance to seal the game against Auburn, but let the Tigers drive down the field with relative ease. They weren't playing with the same attitude they had the rest of the game, and it showed with seven points on the board. Great defenses win games in crunch time. As soon as this defense learns how to do that, it will return to its former greatness.

Can K-State develop depth?

K-State played mainly starters on offense and rotated a lot of players on defense. Defense isn't that big of a concern, except at defensive tackle. Alphonso Moran left the team late in summer, leaving his starting spot for Steven Cline. Cline played well against Auburn, but if he were to go down with an injury, it would leave that position extremely thin. If K-State is blowing out San Jose State this weekend they will probably work in redshirt freshman Gabriel Crews and freshman Xzavier Stewart to create more depth there. On offense, backup quarterback Carson Coffman never has thrown a pass in college. He should get in the game, so he can get the feel for the level of play. Also, K-State needs to give the fans a look at the big wideouts that didn't play at Auburn, freshman Lamark Brown and junior Ernie Pierce. They could create match-up problems in Big 12 play, but they need game experience.

Each week, the Collegian will invite one K-State "celebrity" to make picks along with four writers. The guests' combined record will be listed throughout the season. This week's guest is Steve Smethers, associate professor of journalism and avid K-State fan.

KEYS TO VICTORY

1. ELIMINATE THE PENALTIES

Whether SEC officials love Auburn or not, the K-State defense needs to keep its hands away from the Spartans' facemasks. The Wildcats were charged with everything from personal fouls to false starts to illegal substitutions against Auburn. K-State needs to commit far fewer than 16 penalties to defeat San Jose State.

2. STICK TO THE TRICK

Remember how K-State scored its lone touchdown last week? It seems the Wildcats have mastered the art of pulling out tricks at the right time.

San Jose State will not be able to handle what coach Ron Prince has up his sleeve.

Except for quarterback Josh

Freeman, the Wildcats' offense might be in for a long day of trick plays.

3. SEND TAFRALIS TO THE ABYSS

Spartans quarterback Adam Tafralis struggled in week one, and the Wildcats cannot let him find his groove. Defensive end Rob Jackson sparked K-State's exceptional pass rush against Auburn, totaling two of the team's five sacks. Defensive coordinator Tim Tibesar needs to use his 3-4 scheme in the same way against San Jose State.

4. GUN THE RUN

Arizona State trampled the Spartans' run defense early in the game, as Sun Devils running back Ryan Torain reached the 100-yard mark early in the second quarter. Leon Patton and James Johnson need to have the same success. San Jose State gave up 250 yards, but just half of that would be a significant improvement.

5. USE 'THE BILL' TO KILL

Last week's 23-13 loss at Auburn was matched evenly for most of the game, but in the end the Tigers' home-field advantage helped the team to a late victory. This week, the roles are reversed. The players need to use the noise and atmosphere to their advantage and rattle the Spartans early in the game. A big play out of the gates would certainly set the tone.

Manhattan Regional Airport on Saturday afternoon.

Manhattan Regional Airport hopes to attract commercial airlines far outpaces the capacity of the current airlines here," Van Kuren said.

It is not easy attracting a commercial airline to Manhattan, Van Kuren said. Though passengers currently fill more than 70 percent of the seats for the three daily U.S. Airways Express flights to Kansas City, Van Kuren said commercial airlines do not know if Manhattan could sustain a solid flow of passengers.

"What we have in Manhattan is an unproven market and the airline companies would want us to share in that risk," Van Kuren said.

One way to appease the airlines is to establish a revenue guarantee. Van Kuren said the guarantee would mean the airport would make up for any financial losses the commercial airline would incur. If area passengers only filled half the seats, Van Kuren said the airport would pay for the additional 20-30 percent of seats to make the airline a profit.

"We believe there's a market here," Van Kuren said. "Ultimately (the expansion) would pay for itself, but during the process of bringing in airlines there may be funds required to make sure they're not losing money."

He said this money would have to come from local business and resident contributions.

The airport receives much of its funding through a government subsidy, which restricts much of the capacities of the airport, Van Kuren said. He said he hopes to drop that subsidy and bring in a commercial airline as soon as the end of this year. He said he already has received interest from one commercial airline.

Rich Jankovich, chairman of the airport advisory board, said the commercial flights probably would go to destinations that service East Coast cities, like Dallas, Chicago, St. Louis, Memphis and Kansas City.

Speakers, activities highlight K-State's World Rabies Day event

Manhattan residents listened to live music, got their faces painted and participated in a 5K race Sunday to help raise awareness for rabies.

The K-State World Rabies Day celebration was held at CiCo Park. Organizations like the Alliance for Rabies Control and the Pre-Vet Club at K-State sponsored the event, which lasted from noon to 4 p.m.

Children in attendance had their faces painted, played with balloon animals or jumped in the Octabounce. Local bands provided live music as runners prepared for the 5K race. Even Willie the Wildcat made a brief appearance.

A variety of speakers presented throughout the day, including Dr. Erin Kennedy, member of the rabies team at the Centers for Disease Control, and Patricia Payne, professor of diagnostic medicine and pathology.

Topics addressed ranged from rabies awareness to the correct way for children to approach dogs. Booths and displays from various organizations like the Humane Society and the International Veterinary Student Association were also there.

Event coordinator Mylissia Stuke, research associate at K-State, said the goal of the celebration was two-fold.

"We want to reach out to the public and educate them about rabies, as well as raise funds for the Alliance for Rabies Control," Stuke said.

Stuke said K-State was the first university in the country to celebrate the event. K-State then contacted other universities across the nation, hoping to create more awareness for World Rabies Day. This year, 27 other universities celebrated the event, and 62 countries held similar celebrations.

While rabies is not a persistent issue in the United States, it is a serious killer in other countries like Africa and Asia. Stuke said about 55,000 people die each year from rabies. The proceeds from the event went to the Alliance for Rabies Control to help fight rabies.

About 40 volunteers and 20 sponsors made the event possible.

Carly Shumaker, staff member at the K-State rabies lab, said she was enthusiastic about the turnout for the day.

"Everyone who attended seemed incredibly interested," Shumaker said.

More than 300 people attended the event, including Melaz Matta and her dog Sophie. Matta said she enjoyed the activities.

"I really liked all the speakers and the live music," Matta said, "I would definitely attend this again in the future."

Shumaker said she hoped for an even larger crowd next year.

"We're hoping for bigger and better things in the future," Shumaker said.

Fire listed as arson

By Mayra Rivarola
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Sept. 2 fire at O'Malley's Alley was aggravated arson, said a Manhattan Fire Department spokeswoman.

Allie Lousch, of the fire department, said someone intentionally started the fire.

The fire was started in a bathroom paper towel dispenser.

The fire was contained to the bathroom stall, but there was smoke damage to Ideal Cleaners, a neighboring store.

The fire department is continuing its investigation but has not named a suspect.

K-STATE TV expands audience

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Cox Communications and Wildcat cable channel 8 starts new fall programming and station identification today.

K-STATE TV will feature several new programs, including the 10-program series "Landon Lecture Retrospective." The series will look at K-State's historic Landon Lectures and include interviews with Landon chair Charles Reagan and Nancy Kassebaum Baker, Alf Landon's daughter.

"We're pretty excited about the new venture we started about a year ago," said Jim Mock, director of production services for the Educational Communications Center. "We're developing it slowly since it takes a lot of time and resources."

Cox and Wildcat cable channel 8 received a name change as well as the motto "Educate. Inform. Enrich." The three-word motto describes the programming that the channel brings its viewers, Mock said.

Mock said the channel's name change is simple and allows the communication center to brand K-State promotions as much as it can.

"We are increasing our local K-State focus programming on the channel," Mock said. "We're trying to get some programming produced at students."

K-STATE TV programming originates from the Educational Communications Center located in Bob Dole Hall. The communications center features a media production center with a full broadcast-quality production facility, Mock said.

The center does work-for-hire media production services in addition to providing support for numerous departments at K-State.

K-STATE TV also has a new Web site at www.k-state.tv, Mock said. The site now features a list of programs and a brief programming guide, but Mock said the communications center plans to expand it in the future.

"We hope to expand this over time where we will have streaming video over the Web site, podcasting, extended interviews with a producer or someone featured in the program," he said. "We're slowly beginning to develop that."

Mock said K-STATE TV aims to reach local and re-

Manhattan airport hopes to attract commercial airlines

K-State students and Flint Hills residents soon might not have to drive two hours to Kansas City for their commercial airplane services.

Peter Van Kuren, director of the Manhattan Regional Airport, said he has studied the need for commercial air service in the area and has tried to attract commercial airlines to the airport.

Van Kuren said according to airport studies, 91 percent of the residents in this area drive to Kansas City to fly.

"We would say the demand far outpaces the capacity of the current airlines here," Van Kuren said.

THIS WEEK

A look at events that occurred during this week in history, other bizarre holidays, happenings

TODAY 1897 : First drunk-driving arrest

A 25-year-old London taxi driver named George Smith became the first person ever to be arrested for drunk driving after slamming his cab into a building. Smith later pled guilty and was fined 25 shillings.

In the United States, the first laws against operating a motor vehicle while under the influence of alcohol went into effect in New York in 1910. In 1936, Rolla Harger, a professor of biochemistry and toxicology, patented the Drunkometer, a balloon-like device into which people would breathe to determine whether they were inebriated. In 1953, Robert Borkenstein, a former Indiana state police captain and university professor who had collaborated with Harger on the Drunkometer, invented the Breathalyzer.

TUESDAY 2001 : Attack on America

At 8:45 a.m. on a Tuesday, an American Airlines Boeing 767 loaded with 20,000 gallons of jet fuel crashed into the north tower of the World Trade Center in New York City.

The impact left a gaping, burning hole near the 80th floor of the 110-story skyscraper, instantly killing hundreds of people and trapping hundreds more in higher floors.

As the evacuation of the tower and its twin were underway, TV cameras broadcast live images of what initially appeared to be a freak accident.

Then, 18 minutes after the first plane hit, a second Boeing 767 — United Airlines Flight 175 — appeared out of the sky, turned sharply toward the World Trade Center, and sliced into the south tower at about the 60th floor.

The collision caused a massive explosion that showered burning debris over surrounding buildings and the streets below.

WEDNESDAY 1940 : Lascaux cave paintings discovered

Near Montignac, France, four teenagers discovered a collection of prehistoric cave paintings after following their dog down a narrow entrance into a cavern. The 15,000- to 17,000-year-old paintings, consisting mostly of animal representations, are among the finest examples of art from the Upper Paleolithic period.

THURSDAY 1814 : Key pens Star-Spangled Banner

On this day in 1814, Francis Scott Key pens a poem which later was set to music and in 1931 became America's national anthem, "The Star-Spangled Banner." The poem, originally "The Defense of Fort McHenry," was written after Key witnessed the Maryland fort being bombarded by the British during the War of 1812. Key was inspired by the sight of a lone U.S. flag still flying over Fort McHenry at daybreak, as reflected in the now-famous words of the "Star-Spangled Banner."

Francis Scott Key was born on August 1, 1779, at Terra Rubra, his family's estate in Frederick County (now Carroll County), Maryland. He became a successful lawyer in Maryland and Washington, D.C., and later was appointed U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia.

FRIDAY 1901 : McKinley dies from gunshot wounds

On this day in 1901, President William McKinley died after being shot by a deranged anarchist during the Pan-American Exposition in Buffalo, New York.

McKinley won his first Congressional seat at the age of 34 and spent 14 years in the House, becoming known as the leading Republican expert on tariffs.

After losing his seat in 1890, McKinley served two terms as governor of Ohio. By 1896, he had emerged as the leading Republican candidate for president, aided by the support of the wealthy Ohio industrialist Mark Hanna. That fall, McKinley defeated his Democratic rival, William Jennings Bryan, by the largest popular margin since the Civil War.

As president, McKinley became known — controversially — as a protector of big businesses, which enjoyed unprecedented growth during his administration.

Percussion group uses unconventional objects to make music

By Emily Sterk
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ladders, drills, power saws and other objects were the instruments of choice on Friday night at McCain Auditorium.

Recycled Percussion performed 12 pieces and featured a twist on the theme of Man vs. Machine.

Four guys from New Hampshire form the group Recycled Percussion — Justin Spencer, founder and drummer; Ryan Vezina, drummer; Todd Griffin (aka DJ Pharaoh); and Jim Magoon, guitar.

Griffin said the group created its show around the Man vs. Machine theme.

"The whole idea is that you can take two guys who use semi-conventional instruments — guitars, turn tables, keyboards and samplers — and put them against people who have nothing more than sticks in their hands banging on buckets, and both of them can be just as entertaining and musically talented," Griffin said.

Spencer said he wanted to showcase more rock'n'roll.

"We decided to take a guitar and DJ and let them be the machines versus two guys on buckets, which would be the men, and make the show against each other," Spencer said.

Recycled Percussion needed a good reason to incorporate instruments into the show, which is one reason the theme became Man vs. Machine, Vezina said.

"We started to harness what we were doing, and turned it into more of a rock show than just a novelty," Vezina said. "We needed more musical aspects to it, so Justin came up with the theme Man vs. Machine where it is just raw human beings using their hands and their body to create rhythm versus these guys who have endless amounts of money to making music pressing buttons and using electronics."

The set started with a pre-recorded machine-like voice saying, "When man performs like machine, does he perform harder?" Out of nowhere, Spencer started a drum roll on a trash can while Vezina and Magoon threw drumsticks at him. Spencer caught the drumsticks and did not lose speed or get off beat.

Each piece had a different purpose. Five featured the two drummers, Spencer and Vezina, banging on their buckets, pipes and cymbals.

Spencer can roll more than 20 strokes in one second.

Kevin Dawson, freshman in mechanical engineering, said Spencer's solo was his favorite part of the performance.

"The best part was when Justin proved he had the fastest single stroke," Dawson said.

Lucas Bergstrom, freshman in architecture, said he could not believe the speed with which Spencer and Vezina could drum.

"I was impressed with how fast they were and how crazy they got," Bergstrom said.

The Union Program Council invited Recycled Percussion as part of its After Hours series. Recycled Percussion performed at a national conference two years ago, which prompted UPC to bring the group to K-State, said Sarah Morton, former UPC president and senior in accounting.

"UPC tries to bring all different types of groups to campus and tries to expose the student population (to) as much as possible," Morton said.

Several students said they were impressed with the high energy of the group and how Recycled Percussion cannot compare to other musical groups because of their distinctiveness.

"I loved the whole time they were banging on the trash cans, and I liked the ladders and audience participation," said Ashley Kurelac, freshman in interior design.

Recycled Percussion is known for trick like drumming on ladders while they walk on them and allowing audience members to come up on stage.

Eleven members from the audience, children and K-State students, went on stage and played games like stick toss and "Simon Says" with Spencer and Vezina.

"I got on stage, and it was really embarrassing but really fun to do something, and I was really excited about the audience interaction," said Clarissa Wagner, freshman in open option.

Man vs. Machine featured intense rhythms, beat boxing, and solos performed in attention-grabbing styles. During one solo, Magoon played his guitar with a drill.

Other instruments included saws, pots and shoes.

"I liked the really random equipment, like the saws and the power drills, and all the other really cool equipment that you can make a really sweet, stellar noise out of," said Eric Schroeder, junior in construction science and management.

Recycled Percussion a 'brotherhood' that has secrets, pre-show rituals

By Emily Sterk
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Recycled Percussion has been together for 11 years and began performing as part of a high-school talent show.

Formed by Justin Spencer, who placed second in the talent show, Recycled Percussion has changed the way people look at simple, everyday objects, Spencer said.

"We opted to do a show with recycled objects, because we wanted to be more creative," he said. "Someone saw us, and it snowballed, and here we are."

Justin Spencer, Ryan Vezina, Todd Griffin and Jim Magoon form the group that brings kitchen sinks, ladders, drills, trash cans and other household objects to a new level.

Recycled Percussion has performed across the country. Starting in middle schools and high schools, Recycled Percussion also has performed at universities, NFL football games and has opened for Kanye West, Godsmack and other talents.

"The message of the show is to inspire people to make something out of nothing," Vezina said. "You can start from scratch and create your own thing."

Vezina also said the use of ordinary objects appeals to audiences, because it is something different. Recycled Percussion does not repeat or mimic anything else, Griffin said.

"You look at the whole world a different way — you don't look at the kitchen sink the same way, a step ladder the same way," Vezina said. "It makes you think, 'How can I use other things?' — and not just in a musical way."

Griffin said the current Recycled Percussion members have been together for about two years.

"We get along really well," Griffin said. "We read each others' body language really well. We rarely have to talk on stage."

When asked how he got into the group, Vezina said it was just luck. Vezina left high school a year early to join the group and found out from photo albums that Spencer, the lead drummer, is his cousin.

"I ran into Justin in a weird way," Vezina said. "I was looking at photo albums and saw pictures of Justin and got really confused. The kid I was envying was my cousin."

After performing for more than a decade, Spencer said the group still has a long way to go.

"I think in the next few years, we'll nail it down," Spencer said. "We haven't reached our peak yet. It takes time to put out a good product to people."

Spencer has the letters ESNTR tattooed on his abdomen. The meaning of the letters is a secret, but the band members said the tattoo reminds them why they are on stage.

"It is to remind us that it doesn't matter how many people are in the audience, whether there is five or 5,000, we should be putting on the same show; we shouldn't let a small crowd affect our performance," Griffin said.

Vezina said the purpose of the group — besides loving to perform and playing music — is to help the audience think outside the box.

"A lot of people get lost in the world of redundancy and occupations, just repeating what other people have done, and we wanted to do something and worked hard enough — we achieved this after 10 years," Vezina said.

Touring from August to the following May, Spencer said a day without a performance is a day wasted.

"It's a brotherhood," Spencer said. "Everyone here are best friends. We do it more for ourselves than the audience, and they see that. When the crowd sees us enjoy our job they resonate that."

HIT OR MISS | The editorial board selects Hit or Miss topics and writes them after a majority vote. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

HIT | WEEKEND WIN

The football team played a great game Saturday and came up with a win. Josh Freeman passed for more than 270 yards and had one throwing and one rushing touchdown.

MISS | MISSING PILOT

Adventurer Steve Fossett went missing last week when his plane never returned from a flight. The search for him began last Monday evening and still has been unable to discover any trace of Fossett or his plane.

HIT | STATE FAIR

The best and the brightest from around the great state of Kansas will have a place to shine for the next few days at the Kansas State Fair, which began last week. The fair had an impressive concert line up, including Aly & AJ and Chicago.

HIT | PAVAROTTI'S LEGACY

Famed Italian tenor Luciano Pavarotti died last week from pancreatic cancer. The 71-year-old had one of the greatest voices of his generation, and he will be missed by many around the globe.

HIT | FALL SALES

In order to make room for all the new winter clothes and gear, many stores at the Manhattan Town Center mall have begun their fall sales. Get out early to get the best deals.

MISS | AUBURN LOSING

The Auburn Tigers were upset Saturday by the University of South Florida. The loss hurts K-State and the strength of schedule later in the season when it comes time for bowl selection.

Lending a hand

Congress increases Pell Grant funding, offers loan like GI Bill

Elvis Achelphol | COLLEGIAN

Friends, students, wildcats, lend me your ears; if you do, the government might lend you some money.

On Friday, Congress approved an overhaul of the federal student loan program. This overhaul will increase funding for Pell grants, increase the maximum a student can request and offer loan forgiveness to students of certain professions.

According to the New York Times, after an initial veto threat from President Bush, Democrats in Congress made some minor changes to the legislation, which passed 79-12 in Senate.

The bill had widespread bipartisan support and an encouraging nod from Education Secretary Margaret Spellings.

Overhauling the federal grant system was a top campaign tool for Democrats leading up to the 2006 elections. But their efforts were slowed when Republicans in Congress — and Bush — made a fuss.

This victory is a gasp for air for the Democratic majority, given the increase of the minimum wage was the only campaign promise Democrats have fulfilled since taking office in January.

According to the New York Times, the previous maximum grant amount of $4,310 will increase to $5,400 over the next four years. One of the reasons for the increase was the fact that the Republican majority of years past cut the Pell budget.

"We took $11.39 billion and put it back into Pell grants," said George Miller (D-Calif), head of the House education committee. "That's the difference that an election makes."

The increase in loan amounts is a necessary tool to curb the skyrocketing costs of college.

At K-State alone, tuition increased eight percent for a 15 credit hour schedule, according to the Aug. 28 edition of the Collegian.

Recent college lending scandals have caused confidence in private lenders to plummet. The Democrats stepped up to help students pay for an education to which everyone should have the right.

Congressional Republicans and President Bush have tried to stand in the way of the bipartisan overhaul.

House Minority leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) complained the changes "will cripple the private-sector loan program." But it would appear to the average American the private sector already has done that to itself.

Also, the new changes will allow for certain loans to be forgiven. Ac-ording to the same article from the Times, if graduates work for 10 or more years as a public servant — police officer, fire fighter, teacher — they could ask for their grants to be forgiven.

OWEN KENNEDY

Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) likened the new legislation to the GI Bill.

"Today we need a similar bold new commitment to enable the current generation of Americans to rise to the global challenges we face," he said.

The GI Bill gave more opportunities to citizens who served our country in the armed forces.

Unfortunately, college has gotten so expensive that most Americans need assistance to get the education needed to stay competitive in an unforgiving job market.

Sen. Kennedy was right in saying our generation is faced with great global challenges. The only way the United States can maintain a competitive advantage in a globalized world is to make sure its labor force is trained and educated.

If we fail to make a higher education available to all citizens, we will stand idly by as we are passed by China, India and other nations in the world market. This, my friends, would be a Julius Caesar-type tragedy.

Citizens should not live in fear of attacks

It's that time of year again, when your girlfriend gets cramps, the moon is full and Osama bin Laden has produced another video taunting the world.

Watch out, Steven Spielberg, bin Laden is coming from behind, putting the world in fear, one made-for-Internet video at a time.

As the grim sixth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks approaches, bin Laden slams American capitalism in his video release.

According to a Sept. 8 Associated Press report, the new 30-minute message appeared on several militant Islamic Web sites Saturday, one day after it was released by a U.S.-based terrorist monitoring organization.

Analysts believe bin Laden's message was made in August, covering a hodgepodge of recent events regarding the U.S. presidential cabinet, election of foreign officials and historic events like the anniversary of the 1945 atomic bomb attack on Hiroshima. But the message keeping security experts on their toes is bin Laden's attempt at reconciliation with the United States: Join us, or we'll kill you.

"One (solution) is from our side, and it is to escalate the fighting and killing against you. This is our duty, and our brothers are carrying it out," bin Laden said. "The second solution is from your side ... I invite you to embrace Islam."

It's not enough bin Laden has threatened U.S. soil for more than a decade, but the man continues to threaten us with his shaky video camera.

Though it's been three years — and a box of Just For Men later — since we've last heard from the man who has connections to the most threatening terrorist organization in the world, bin Laden has set a precedent for one thing: change. And other international leaders should follow — just not on his exact terms.

In our post-Sept. 11 world, the United States has tried to brand itself as a strong country, progressing the message of freedom and democracy around the world.

After jeopardizing diplomatic relations with European nations and killing thousands of our soldiers abroad, where is the United States going? At the risk of losing the lives of our American mothers, fathers, brothers and sisters, we must ask ourselves if freedom is truly worth it — and will bin Laden get the memo too?

Through these actions, the government has sent a clear message to the public: We shouldn't live in fear. Unfortunately, we do. The fear is broadcast on the 10 o'clock news and written on our faces when we hear it. You can hear fear during church sermons or among the students speaking about it in the quad.

Whatever the next move is, the United States must persevere with courage in its heart.

Immediately after Sept.

11, people proudly hung the American flag in their homes — and their hearts. But the sense of patriotism has fallen.

We are no longer united, and fear has overwhelmed the world yet again. The next time you flip on the boob tube or read about bin Laden's tactics while surfing the Internet, remember that this country has gone through many tribulations.

All the news you hear regarding national security is just a bunch of hooey — simple fear — coming from an old man's home video.

Local store features 'rhythmic' name, variety of fabric, jewelry

By Monica Castro
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"Sing a song of sixpence, a pocket full of rye; four and 20 blackbirds baked in a pie."

The opening lyrics to the nursery rhyme "Sing a song of sixpence" might not be heard everyday, but the phrase "four and 20 blackbirds" was the inspiration for a store on Poyntz Avenue.

Susan Kice, owner of Four and Twenty Blackbirds, 427 Poyntz Ave., said the jewelry and fabric store's name came from the rhyme.

"I had gotten advice that the name needed to be rhythmic," Kice said. "I kept saying I want the store to have four and 20 different things, and blackbirds were always in the back of my head."

Kice said the store's motto is "Four and 20 fine things for you, your family and your home."

While the store offers everything from toys to jewelry to upholstery, it is dominated by a variety of fabrics.

"To get fabrics, you have to have a retail space," Kice said. "So having a shop this size with fabrics is rare."

Kice said she loved downtown Poyntz Avenue and took the opportunity to open her shop there in November 2005 when a place became available.

Andrea Auckly, Manhattan resident, said she likes the choice of fabrics the store offers.

She said Kice is knowledgeable about the fabrics and always has ideas for projects.

"I have kids and Susan showed me fabric where everything cleans off of it," she said.

Kice said she has used her expertise to help K-State students design projects.

Andrea Granger, sophomore in agribusiness, said she visits the store to pick out fabric.

"I went with my mom to help pick out fabrics for pillows and stuff we were going to get reupholstered," Granger said. "The store is cool, and they have a lot of choices for fabrics."

Besides the fabric that fill the entire store, there is a selection of high-end jewelry that is made in Kansas, Kice said.

She said the handmade jewelry is from the Saint collection by Sarah Jane, and the prices start at about $100.

Kice said the jewelry might seem expensive, but it is good quality.

"I try to bring in stuff that no one has," she said.

The local store also offers a selection of children's toys and European reproductions of furniture

Rally ends with fireworks show

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Friday night was the second night of Purple Power Play on Poyntz, an annual pep rally put on to celebrate the football season.

Several K-State sports teams made it to the stage to receive applause from the crowd.

The football team made an appearance to excite the crowd, and the Classy Cats danced along with the cheerleaders.

Football coach Ron Prince addressed the crowd with words of encouragement for the season to come.

The two-day event ended with the INTRUST Bank fireworks display, wowing the crowd and filling the night with brilliant flashes of sound and light.

The soundtrack to the fireworks was energetic and kept the fans' attention throughout.

Members of the K-State and Manhattan communities of all ages were in the crowd that filled Poyntz Avenue.

Lisa Rockley, president of Purple Power Play on Poyntz said the organization required for this event called for the coordination of several different groups of people.

"This event is a coordination of volunteers, coordination of sponsors and a co-ordination of Kansas State University," she said.

Rockley went on to say the City of Manhattan and Manhattan Town Center also were key in the organization of the event.

California, 11 other states consider banning teens from using electronics while driving

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SAN FRANCISCO — Narin Leininger knows about the risks of talking on a cell phone or sending text messages while driving. The 16-year-old high school junior says he'd only use his phone behind the wheel in an emergency — a flat tire, traffic jam or crash.

But if he ever decided to whip out his phone to chat or text with a friend while steering, he wondered, could anyone stop him?

"There's no way a cop could see if you're texting under the steering wheel," said Leininger, a student at San Francisco's Lowell High School.

Still, California and at least 11 other states are considering bills banning teens from using electronic equipment while driving, according to the American Automobile Association.

At least 15 states and the District of Columbia have passed bans.

Supporters say teen-specific regulations — which generally amend existing laws that apply to everyone, or add provisions to graduated licensing laws for young motorists — reduce driver distraction and save lives. Opponents say they're another example of government meddling into citizens' private behavior — and teaching students proper driving skills is a parent's duty, not the state's.

California's bill could land on Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's desk this week.

Schwarzenegger, whose daughter turned 16 and began driving last year, hasn't indicated whether he'd sign it.

The legislation, introduced by California Sen. Joe Simitan, would take effect next July.

It would ban 16- and 17-year-olds from using any electronic device while driving — cell phones, text messaging devices, laptop computers, pagers, walkie-talkies and handheld computers, even those with "hands-free" features. (Last year, Schwarzenegger signed a bill that prohibits all drivers from holding a cell phone while driving. The measure, which takes effect in July 2008, allows hands-free devices.)

Violators of the proposed teen bill would get a $20 fine for the first offense and a $50 fine for subsequent offenses, but they wouldn't get points on their records.

"I introduced this bill for one simple reason — it will save lives," said Simitan, a Palo Alto Democrat.

There's been little scientific research directly linking texting and car accidents, but anecdotal evidence — and common sense — suggest it's too distracting.

Last month, police in suburban Phoenix blamed a teen's text-messaging habit for a head-on crash that killed two people. Ashley D. Miller, 18, wasn't wearing a seat belt and was texting on her cell phone while driving in Peoria, Ariz., when her Ford pickup crossed a lane and smashed into a Chrysler PT Cruiser, killing 40-year-old driver Stacey A. Stubbs.

In June, a head-on wreck in New York's Finger Lakes region killed five teenagers who graduated from high school five days earlier. Though police didn't conclusively link texting with the deaths, the crash happened only moments after the 17-year-old driver had sent and received text messages.

The accident — in which the teen's SUV swerved into oncoming traffic, hit a tractor-trailer and burst into flames — prompted New York State Sen. Carl Marcellino to introduce a bill banning writing, sending or reading text messages while driving.

FOOTBALL | K-STATE 34, SAN JOSE STATE 14

TURNING POINT

James Johnson's 4-yard touchdown run with 14:23 to play in the fourth quarter

The Wildcats put San Jose State away with a 17-point fourth quarter, sparked by Johnson's first rushing touchdown of the season.

QUOTE OF THE GAME

Deon Murphy | On his first career touchdown reception, a 15-yard catch from quarterback Josh Freeman.
"Like I said, I'm real humble. I feel like I can do that all the time — all day, every day."

MAGIC NUMBER

25 | That's the number of penalties through two games after the Wildcats committed nine against San Jose State. It's also the number of completions for quarterback Josh Freeman and the number of first downs for the Wildcats on Saturday.

MVP

Deon Murphy | The junior wideout caught a touchdown, ran for another and broke a 56-yard punt return.

McKinney's playing too aggressive

Justin McKinney isn't a bad guy.

He doesn't kick puppies or steal lollipops from children or leave outrageously bad tips at restaurants.

It's just that, well, sometimes his emotions get the best of him. On the football field, when the adrenaline is pulsing and the fans are screaming and the bodies are flying, the line between right and wrong gets a little blurry.

OK, so McKinney's been whistled for a few penalties this season. Four to be exact — two in the season opener against Auburn and two in Saturday's 34-14 win over San Jose State. And yes, most of them involved some form of excess brutality, like yanking a facemask or delivering a late hit.

The penalties have become a joke, a punchline, a reason for sportswriters to make snarky comments like, "What do Justin McKinney and New Mexico have in common?" (They both have yellow flags, in case you were wondering.)

So why doesn't McKinney just stop? Why doesn't he keep his hands to himself and let the guy run out of bounds?

Obviously, it's not quite that easy. McKinney knows the penalties are bad — coach Ron Prince makes sure of that. But somehow, the connection between knowing and doing hasn't quite clicked, and that's why Prince is so miffed.

"I'm not happy with 'em," Prince said. "I'm not happy with 'em at all. I didn't think there was anything out there that had to happen."

It wasn't clear whether Prince was talking about McKinney or K-State's penalties in general, but it's safe to say he wasn't pleased with either. The Wildcats were penalized nine times against San Jose State, raising their season total to 25 yellow flags in two games.

Even McKinney himself is at a loss to explain why the penalties keep happening.

"I don't know, man," he said. "I just feel like I'm playing a little bit over-aggressive. I'm giving everything I got to the team, and that's what cost me."

So what's the solution? A group intervention, perhaps? A trip to Late Hitters Anonymous?

Or is this a problem McKinney has to fix on his own?

"There's nothing wrong with the way I play," McKinney said. "I just got to be smarter about some of the things I do. That's on me. That's internal."

If admitting you have a problem is the first step toward recovery, then McKinney seems to be on the right track. Maybe there's hope for him yet.

Prince, for one, seems to believe McKinney is close to solving his penalty problems. After McKinney's second infraction on Saturday, Prince pulled the senior cornerback off the field for a heart-to-heart, the kind of deep discussion that can affect profound behavioral change.

"I think he got the point from what I was saying," Prince said.

After hearing that, reporters flocked to McKinney to find out what pearl of wisdom Prince imparted.

"He just said ... I forgot what he said," McKinney paused. "He was just saying I gotta be more mentally focused."

OK, this might be harder than we thought.

Wildcats clinch home-opener win in 4th quarter

By Jeffrey Rake
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State didn't earn many style points in its 34-14 triumph over San Jose State on Saturday night at Snyder Family Stadium. Not after careless mistakes prevented the Wildcats from putting the game out of reach prior to the fourth quarter.

For starters, those darn penalties haunted them again, just a week after the Wildcats hoped to improve upon — in a big way — their 16-penalty, 141-yard performance against Auburn. K-State was flagged nine times for 96 yards, including a pair of personal fouls.

"Everyone can see that the penalties are holding us back as a team," wide receiver Jordy Nelson said. "We need to take control and do the right thing."

Then there was the play of cornerback Justin McKinney, whose aggressiveness in man-to-man coverage made him an easy target. He gave up Jalal Beauchman's 20-yard touchdown reception midway through the second quarter, a play that pulled the Spartans within 10-7 after they gave up points on each of K-State's first two possessions.

"I don't want to play passive — that's not my type of style," said McKinney, who also picked up a personal foul and a pass-interference penalty.

Finally, there was Josh Freeman, whose night was altogether solid except for a pair of interceptions. He had 217 yards passing by halftime, but managed only 55 more by game's end. The two interceptions, he said, were passes he wished he could have back.

"I don't know if I was feeling too comfortable or what. It should have never happened," Freeman said.

Spartans use multiple formations to run same plays against K-State

By Ryne Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

San Jose State kept the K-State defense busy with a variety of offensive formations in the Wildcats' 34-14 victory Saturday.

At the start of the second half, the Spartans came out with two quarterbacks on the field at the same time. Starting quarterback Adam Trafalis lined up at wide receiver and caught three passes before leaving the game with a shoulder injury.

"I think they came out in the second half and tried to do a few things different with two quarterbacks out there and tried to give themselves more options," said junior Ian Campbell. "I think they were trying to do whatever they could to move the ball."

The offensive trickery helped the Spartans gain 178 more yards than they gained last week at Arizona State. They had 115 yards against the Sun Devils.

"We moved the ball better against them than we did at Arizona State," Spartan head coach Dick Tomey said. "But I think they're a very good defense."

The K-State defense made adjustments throughout the game to slow down the attack. The Wildcats brought in four down-linemen and switched to nickel coverage, putting sophomore Chris Carney at cornerback because of injuries.

"We knew they were going to run the same plays over and over," linebacker John Houlik said. "They were just trying to confuse us with the different formations."

Houlik finished with eight tackles on the night, including four on one drive.

The Spartans also were forced to use four different quarterbacks because of injuries. San Jose State quarterbacks finished a combined 28 of 41 for 220 yards and two touchdowns.

"I think that they may have had some quarterback injuries and that caused them to change a few things," Campbell said.

The Spartans might have changed a few things, but the K-State defenders said they knew what was coming.

"They were confusing when they lined up, but when it was all said and done, they were running the same couple plays," defensive end Rob Jackson said.

The defense finished with three sacks and eight tackles for a loss, allowing 293 total yards and 73 on the ground.

The Wildcats still see room for improvement.

"I'd give us a B-plus for effort," Campbell said. "The guys were trying really hard out there. As far as tackling I

No. 22 K-State (8-2) swept all three of its opponents in the Varney's Kansas State Invitational, claiming the tournament title with Saturday's win over Fresno State.

Arkansas (6-4), K-State's first opponent Friday, fell in three straight games to the Wildcats (30-23, 30-23, 30-27). During the match, senior Angie Lastra broke the K-State record for career digs, passing former Wildcat Kim Zschau.

The Wildcats' second match Friday was against Northern Iowa (5-5). Rita Lilion led K-State with 16 kills on .324 hitting. Megan Farr and Kelsey Chipman also finished with double-figure kills.

After two wins Friday, the Wildcats were challenged by the Fresno State Bulldogs (2-7) on Saturday. K-State secured the tournament victory, bringing down the Bulldogs in three games (30-9, 30-19, 30-17).

The team has finished the preseason and faces Kansas on Wednesday in conference play.

The K-State and KU cross-country country teams split in their dual meet Friday at Warner Park.

The women's team, which had never beaten KU in a dual, won 35-22 and captured three of the top five individual spots. The Wildcats' Beverly Ramos finished first, followed by Liliani Mendez in second and Megan-Anne Perrin in fifth.

The men fell to the Jayhawks by a score of 39-21 but clinched two top-5 individual finishes.

K-State's Alex Umberger finished third, with teammate Danny Schneider taking fourth. Finishing first in the men's individual was KU's Colby Wissel, the defending Big 12 champion.

"On the women's side, we ran well as a team," said coach Michael Smith. "We had never won this meet before, so I'm pleased that we were able to win, but I still have higher expectations for how we win. We need to be more competitive."

RENO, Nev. — Rescue crews searching for famed millionaire adventurer Steve Fossett stumbled upon more false leads Sunday when they discovered more plane wreckage — but didn't find the missing aviator or his plane.

"Once again, you had your hopes raised and dashed, just as we have," Nevada Civil Air Patrol Maj. Cynthia Ryan told reporters during a news conference.

Rescue crews spotted two old wrecks, one of them from a U.S. Navy plane, southeast of the private ranch where Fossett was staying 80 miles southeast of Reno when he took off Monday for what was supposed to be a three-hour flight.

The false alarm further dampened spirits of the rescuers, whose chances of finding the 63-year-old Fossett alive in the rugged, concealing landscape of western Nevada are becoming more and more slim.

"The mood is very somber but very focused," Lyon County Undersheriff Joe Sanford said.

At least eight times during the search, rescue crews have spotted airplane wreckage they thought might be Fossett's only to learn it was from crashes years and sometimes decades ago.

To some, that is an ominous sign of how hard it will be to find the aviator.

That's always a possibility — that he may never be found," Lyon County Undersheriff Joe Sanford said. "But I'd like to believe that with our state-of-the-art technology, the chances of finding him are much better."

Fossett, a former commodities trader who was the first to circle the globe in a balloon, is considered an expert pilot and survivalist. Search teams have tried to remain optimistic but acknowledged the futility was beginning to take a toll.

"It's not frustrating, but tiring," Nevada National Guard Capt. April Conway said.

Leaders of the search-and-rescue operation have tried to put the best face on the discoveries of previously unknown crash sites. At the very least, they say, the finds have demonstrated that crews can indeed spot small planes from the air.

The search has spread across an area of 17,000 square miles, twice the size of New Jersey.

Crews will continue combing sections of that vast landscape, but on Sunday they began focusing on the territory within 50 miles of the ranch. Most crashes occur within that radius during takeoffs or landings, Ryan said.

"We've got close to 100 percent covered, at least in some cursory fashion," Ryan said. "We have to eliminate a lot of territory."

The discovery of at least six previously unknown wrecks in such a short time has been a stark demonstration of the odds against finding Fossett's single-engine Bellanca Citabria Super Decathlon.

The Florida-based Air Force Rescue Coordination Center, which is helping coordinate the search, maintains a registry of known plane wreck sites.

The registry has 129 entries for Nevada. But over the last 50 years, aviation officials estimate, more than 150 small planes have disappeared in Nevada, a state with more than 300 mountain ranges carved with steep ravines, covered with sagebrush and pinon pine trees and with peaks rising to 11,000 feet.

"The mountains are quite rugged, and things don't always get found," said Maj. Cynthia Ryan of the Nevada Civil Air Patrol.

Once the search for Fossett is over, or significantly scaled back, inspectors from the Federal Aviation Administration likely will be sent to each of the newly discovered wrecks. They will try to identify the pilots and bring closure to their families, agency spokesman Ian Gregor said.

Dogs, pet owners enjoy activities at 3rd-annual PetPoolooza

By Monica Castro
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Pet owners and their dogs swam in the pool at CiCo Park Sunday afternoon for the third-annual PetPoolooza festival.

Residents enjoyed several activities throughout the day, like participating in an agility demo and perusing the various vendors' merchandise.

Many participants spent most of the time with their pets at the pool.

Kathy Burkholder, a Manhattan resident, said she looked forward to watching the various types of dogs at the event.

"This event is an unusual thing to have just for dogs, and it is a unique way to use the city pool for the dogs," Burkholder said.

She said she thought PetPoolooza was a fun way to bring dog lovers together.

Though most of the attendees lived in Manhattan, several PetPoolooza guests were from other Kansas cities.

Marlene Marshall, a Wichita resident, said she came all the way to Manhattan just so her puppy could participate in the event.

She said she came last year and has been looking forward to this year's festival ever since.

Marshall said she likes coming because it's one of the few chances for dogs to interact.

Steve Lies, a McPherson, Kan., resident, had heard that an event like PetPoolooza was held in Hutchinson, Kan., and thought it was exciting to bring his pets for the Manhattan event.

"I think this event is well organized, and there are lots of activities for dogs to do," Lies said.

"And it is nice that people are considerate of other people and their dogs." Participants also had the opportunity to talk to several vendors about their pet services and learn how to better care for their pets.

The Manhattan Association for Responsible Canine Ownership provided information for pet owners about dog safety.

Lori Neer, MARCO representative, said the organization works to promote good dog ownership and safety.

MARCO was started about a year ago when Kansas cities were rewriting dog legislation banning certain breeds.

The nonprofit group formed as a way to help the city find alternative options to the legislation.

Lynn Schumacher, Manhattan animal shelter supervisor, managed the event and greeted guests and pets throughout the day.

"PetPoolooza is held to raise money for the animal shelter," Schumacher said. "The money is used to provide extra care for pets, vaccinations, medications and comfort items for pets."

Shumacher said most of the money will go to renovate the cat holding area to keep it free from diseases. Last year's proceeds went toward purchasing food for cats and dogs that live in the animal shelter.

Scylla, a Chihuahua, hangs on the edge of the CiCo Park children's pool during the PetPoolooza Sunday afternoon. The event was a chance for owners to bring their dogs to the pool or play in other areas of the park.

"We enjoy this event because we see people being responsible pet owners and that everyone is having a good time together," Schumacher said.

Foreign language skills give students more advantages when searching for jobs

By Dawn Murphy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The world is changing. Today's global job market requires some form of cross-cultural competency, and job candidates no longer can get by with the basics. Now they must know how to see the business world through another's eyes.

Bradley Shaw, associate professor of Spanish and director of international and area studies, said studying a foreign language is necessary to be prepared for the job market.

"Language is a tie breaker when it comes to a job," he said. "The job candidate who knows a foreign language is more likely to get the job than the candidate who does not when both candidates are equally qualified."

Shaw said knowledge of a foreign language is important because it allows people to keep up with an increasingly diverse society.

"People who are comfortable in a more diverse working environment are likely to succeed, while those who feel threatened by the changing workplace are likely to fall behind, especially in the business world," he said.

Shaw said knowing foreign languages gives insight into other cultures.

"If you are a person who is fluent in a foreign language, you are culturally sensitive to that culture and are better able to understand the people of that culture," he said. "Today's world is increasingly multilingual, multiethnic, multiracial and religiously diverse."

Kerri Day Keller, director of Career and Employment Services, said there are many professional fields that require knowledge of a foreign language or some form of cross-cultural competency, including marketing, health care, teaching and sales.

"Knowing a second or even third language is a major criterion in these fields," said Keller. "The United States is also doing a lot of business with China these days, so I think it would clearly be advantageous for a student to know Chinese in today's growing business world."

Keller said knowledge of a foreign language is beneficial, though it is not required in most entry-level positions.

"Language skills, for the most part, seem to have no bearing on whether or not a student gets an entry-level job," she said. "The distribution of students in entry-level positions that know a foreign language is about the same as those who do not."

There are exceptions to the rule however, like health care, Keller said.

"Even in entry-level jobs, they strongly prefer one who is fluent in both English and Spanish," she said.

Several students at K-State are learning languages and combining them with their respective majors in order to have an advantage while job searching.

Mackenzie Goodwin, sophomore in theater, said she is fluent in Spanish and French and wants to learn Russian soon.

She said she hopes to combine her knowledge of languages with her theater major to give her an edge on other job applicants.

"In today's world, one is expected to know Spanish and English in this country or at least one foreign language," Goodwin said. "It's hard to get by in the business world if you don't."

"Even though there are certain jobs that don't require fluency in a foreign language, I think all students should take at least one semester of a foreign language. If a student knows only a little bit of a second language, I think it'll help them in today's job world, regardless."

Natascha Henderson, senior in park management and conservation, said she has studied foreign languages to prepare her for future work in another country.

She said she would like to learn Swahili someday because she plans to do conservation work in West Africa.

"I think that everyone needs to learn a foreign language," she said. "It gives someone more opportunities for jobs and gives off a good impression."

Besides speaking Russian, Ross Terry, junior in accounting and finance, would like to combine his language skills with a certification in international business.

"Basically, I want to take some businesses from the United States and move them to Russia for an outsourcing type deal," Ross said. "Russia doesn't have a lot of businesses over there right now, and I think they need some."

Shaw said students who do not see value in cultural, racial and linguistic differences are not going to thrive in tomorrow's world, as a company or as an individual.

"Let's say you're talking about a marketing job, for instance," he said. "The more diverse the consultants are at the marketing firm, the more likely it is they will succeed in identifying the needs and interests of different target groups."

Shaw suggested when consumers notice sales representatives speaking their dominant language, it is psychologically and emotionally inviting to the consumer.

He said it conveys a message to the consumer that says, "Hey, you understand me, you understand my culture; I can trust you." The buyer is then more likely to give full attention to the sales pitch.

Shaw said the "Got Milk?" advertising campaign by the dairy industry was a prime example of how marketing should take cultural differences into consideration.

Marketing specialists found that milk had the lowest sales among Hispanic consumers, Shaw said. And when reviewing the campaign, it was found that in Spanish, "Got Milk?" was understood to mean, "Are you lactating?"

Shaw said he thinks one cannot separate language from culture because both are interwoven into the complex ethnic, linguistic and social identity of a person or group of people.

Unusual dishes can be prepared with ingredients found in kitchen

Making a new, off-the-cuff snack that college students can enjoy for less than $8 is not a difficult task — just check the kitchen cabinets.

A snack that can be eaten during any part of the day should be quick and easy to make.

In a poll, one hundred students were asked what they thought was in most college students' kitchens.

Sixty different foods were mentioned, from frozen dinners, carrots, condiments, deli meat, cereal and even no food at all.

College students try to live cheaply, especially when it comes to food. They want it to be quick to make and tasty to eat.

Having a balanced diet doesn't require buying exotic foods. Finding new ways to use basic ingredients is all a college student needs to do.

Four common foods — grapes, applesauce, Pop-Tarts and peanut butter — can be combined to make a treat that is just as easy on the stomach as it is on the wallet.

One of the main draws of the Peanut Butter Sensation Sandwich is how easy it is to prepare. To save time, you can complete other steps while the Pop-Tarts are warming in the toaster.

The first step in the process is to toast the Pop-Tarts. The length of time the Pop-Tarts are in the toaster determines how gooey the inside of the pastry will be.

While the Pop-Tarts are in the toaster, two of the steps can be completed.

Put a spoonful of peanut butter on a plate and mix the applesauce and grapes together.

The final step is putting the combination of foods together. Put the peanut butter on the bottom of the Pop-Tarts and then add the grapes-applesauce mixture in between.

"It was delicious, with the fruity flavor on the inside and the peanut butter on the outside; it was great," said AJ Tarpoff, junior in animal science and industry.

The great thing about this combination of foods is students can mix it up.

Chocolate chip Pop-Tarts, red grapes and regular applesauce were used in this recipe.

However, brown-sugar cinnamon Pop-Tarts also can be used with bananas and strawberry applesauce. The most important element in the recipe is the peanut butter.

"Anything with peanut butter has to be good," said Nicole Kramer, graduate student in accounting.

At Dillon's, all the ingredients cost $7.53 with a Dillon's Plus card.

College students can look in their fridges and cabinets and think of something new: the key ingredient is creativity.

Band returns home

By Brandon McAtee
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A cool, late August night at the Dusty Bookshelf marked the return of a band resembling one many might know as Shhh. This night, however, a packed crowd witnessed the band Kingdom Phylum from Chicago.

Kingdom Phylum, formerly known as Shhh, consists of K-State alumni Court Caywood, Bret Palmer, Simon Bates, Joseph Murphy and Jake Acosta.

"It feels like wintertime and putting on your old coat, except the coat smells like cattle and is a little smaller than you remember," said bassist Bret Palmer about his return to Manhattan, while drummer Court Caywood was "glad to see a lot of friendly faces once again."

The band visited Manhattan as part of an East Coast tour that included stops in New York City, Boston and Philadelphia.

"We had a really good reception at all the places we played, met some really nice people. It was good to get our feet wet," said Murphy, a guitarist in the band.

Touring is never easy, especially for an independent band with essentially no money, and Kingdom Phylum was no exception. Being stuffed in a six-passenger Suburban with equipment and four other people for an entire month would start to wear on anyone.

"It's reassuring to know people on the East Coast are just as receptive to the music as people here," said Acosta, who also plays guitar. "It's not just our friends saying, 'You're good.'"

A new name, a new city and certainly a new sound all fit the description of Manhattan's old friends. Fans looked on as Kingdom Phylum played a number of songs from their new EP, which show the growth and maturation of the band. Intricate sounds with gripping melodies and changing beats show the band's new direction, making one wonder where it will go next.

With bands like Kingdom Phylum emerging from Manhattan, it would certainly appear as if the Little Apple's music scene is continuing to grow.

"Manhattan is an untapped resource of music, especially coming from Lawrence where it is so saturated with venues and bands," said Marty Hillard, a local vocalist/guitarist. Even certain venues are gaining attention, such as the cozy confines of the Dusty Bookshelf, which have always been a favorite of bands from near and far.

Murphy simply said it was "really good to be at the Dusty Bookshelf again," noting "there is really no other place like it."

Bates said the band always will appreciate Manhattan.

"The people in this town are the main reason we believe in ourselves, and I personally would not be making music to this day without them."

WORLD NEWS

MISSING 4-YEAR-OLD'S PARENTS RETURN TO ENGLAND

CASTLE DONINGTON, England — A British couple named as suspects in the disappearance of their 4-year-old daughter returned to England on Sunday, days after being grilled by Portuguese police about new forensic evidence authorities believe ties them to the case.

Kate and Gerry McCann, who strongly denied any involvement in the disappearance of their daughter Madeleine, flew from Faro in southern Portugal with their 2-year-old twins. The father said the couple wanted "to consider the events of the last few days, which have been so deeply disturbing."

"While it is heartbreaking to return to the U.K. without Madeleine, it does not mean we are giving up the search for her," Gerry McCann said on the airport tarmac in central England.

On Friday, Portuguese police named the McCanns as suspects in Madeleine's May 3 disappearance, but did not confiscate their passports or restrict their movements.

Gerry McCann said he and his wife returned home "with the full agreement of the Portuguese authorities and police. We have played no part in the disappearance of our lovely daughter Madeleine," he added before the family left for their home in Rothley, about 100 miles north of London.

The McCanns, who have not been charged, have said they would be available to return to Portugal for questioning if needed.

AL-QAIDA AFFILIATE CLAIMS RESPONSIBILITY FOR ALGERIA BOMBINGS

ALGIERS, Algeria — Al-Qaida's North African affiliate claimed responsibility Sunday for a car bombing that killed 30 coast guard officers and another recent blast that ripped through a crowd waiting for the president.

In Saturday's blast, explosives planted in a van ripped through barracks in the northern coastal town of Dellys, about 30 miles from the capital, Algiers.

The bombing appeared timed to kill as many officers as possible when they were grouped together to raise the flag.

Al-Qaida in Islamic North Africa claimed responsibility in a statement posted on the group's Web site, and it said it also was behind a blast Thursday that killed at least 22 in eastern Algeria.

"We swear to God to continue sacrificing our lives until you stop supporting the crusaders in their war, apply the Islamic tenet and stop your war against God's religion," the group said in the statement.

Al-Qaida in Islamic North Africa has carried out a spate of recent bombings that have shattered the Algerian government's efforts, successful until recently, to restore calm after a 15-year Islamist insurgency.

The government has responded by intensifying military crackdowns on Islamic militants hiding out in remote scrubland. Interior Minister Noureddine Yazid Zerhouni warned terrorists Friday that they have "one choice: Turn themselves in, or die."

IRAQ WARNS COUNTRIES VIOLENCE COULD SPILL INTO THEIR NATIONS

BAGHDAD — Foreign Minister Hoshiyar Zebari urged Iraq's neighbors Sunday to prevent "terrorists and killers" from crossing into his country and warned that the violence in Iraq could spill across its borders into other nations.

Zebari's comments came during the opening of a day-long conference that brought to Baghdad officials from all of Iraq's neighbors and other Middle Eastern countries, as well as representatives from the U.N. and the Group of Eight industrialized nations.

It picked up from the first conference in March, which saw the first direct U.S.-Iranian talks since the war began, focusing on border problems, Iraqi refugees and energy issues, including oil supplies.

"Despite our emphasis on national reconciliation at home we also need to reconcile with our neighborhood, with the international community at large," Zebari told the group, adding it was a "critical period for us."

"We need your support and your commitment," he said.

Iraq's appeal to its neighbors occurred on the eve of the start of congressional hearings in Washington by U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Ryan Crocker and top commander Gen. David Petraeus who are to deliver key reports on Iraq's progress amid a debate over calls to start bringing American troops home.

Officials said security has been improving but they are not seeing significant progress.

PAKISTAN TIGHTENS SECURITY AS FORMER PM SHARIF RETURNS

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — Pakistan stepped up airport security, banned rallies and continued rounding up hundreds of opposition activists Sunday, a day before former Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif's planned return to challenge the military ruler who sent him into exile seven years ago.

Sharif plans to fly to Islamabad on Monday to campaign against President Gen. Pervez Musharraf who ousted Sharif's elected government in a 1999 coup setting up a political showdown that could further shake Musharraf's weakening power and spark unrest. "I will go back to Pakistan on Sept. 10 with my brother because my country needs me," Sharif said Saturday at a news conference in London. "I am going to lead the people of Pakistan against the dictatorship, and the dictator sitting in Islamabad should give up his futile efforts to stop me."

In a television interview broadcast Sunday, Sharif acknowledged he might be arrested on his return on corruption charges from his days in power in the 90s. The government has not said what action, if any, it plans to take against Sharif.

"I know that this is a risky course for me and there can be dangers in it for me. But I am doing this for Pakistan," he told Pakistan's Geo TV channel.

"Nothing else can be more pleasing for me than freeing (Pakistan) from the clutches of military dictatorship," he said.

AIRPORT | Commissioner says accessibility to city will benefit Manhattan

Chicago, St. Louis, Memphis and Kansas City, Mo.

"The key is if we can get those flights that will serve a majority of fliers," Jankovich said.

Van Kuren said the airport also hopes to increase its collaboration with Fort Riley.

The airport currently is expanding one of its airport parking aprons to account for more military aircraft. The airport also is working to shift one of its two runways to allow for more landing safety space.

Van Kuren said the runway needs 400 more feet of safety space if it wants to handle larger aircraft more efficiently. Both projects are funded by federal grants, he said.

He said the airport needs to expand if it is to handle Fort Riley military deployments. Though the airport handles military training exercises and cargo shipments, many of the movements are handled by larger airports. He said the planes responsible for most troop movements have wheel bases that are too wide for the current runway.

"One of the things we would like to do is widen the taxiway, and that would improve the accessibility for Fort Riley," Van Kuren said.

Van Kuren said the Manhattan airport would not need terminal or runway improvements to handle commercial flights, though. The airport could handle most commercial aircraft, and the terminal — built in 1997 — is large enough to maintain a steady amount of passenger traffic. He said the area around the airport could be more inviting to passengers and he hopes to attract a family diner and other businesses to locations near the airport.

Airport expansions would not just serve area residents and Fort Riley. City Commissioner Jim Sherow said it would improve the accessibility to Manhattan and allow businesses easy access to travel. Businesses, especially the proposed National Bio and Agro-Defense Facility, would give Manhattan a longer look if it had commercial air service, he said.

"If we want to be in competition for the type of proposal for the NBAF, we need really good air travel in and out of here," Sherow said.

Jankovich said now is the best time for the airport expansion.

"With all the expansions, redevelopment in Manhattan and increased demand from the university and businesses, the prospects for the airport are growing," he said. "This is probably as large of a demand as I've seen here."

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

The construction on the new Fort Riley hangar and runway expansion is not affecting the daily flights arriving at and departing from the airport.

TV | K-State station aspires to reach national audiences

Mock said K-STATE TV aims to reach local and regional viewers and eventually a larger, more national audience.

"We felt that the local cable channel would be a great outlet for the university and all of the things that are happening in here and in relationship to the community as a whole," Mock said. "We realize we can springboard to other community cable stations and public TV stations in the state."

The channel also gained two new acquired programs — Annenberg Media and Think Talk. Annenberg Media is an educational program that supplements material taught in schools, while Think Talk is a program that discusses career options for college students, Mock said.

Mock said the channel does repeat some of its acquired programming, but the programming is aimed at specific viewers.

"We are a niche-filled market, but we are filling that niche with specialized programming," Mock said. "It reflects the diversity that is K-State."

The communications center did not receive any additional funding for K-STATE TV, and it is using existing staff and resources for it, Mock said. The center must generate about 60 percent of its budget to finance equipment and salaries, Mock said.

The university provides about 40 percent of the center's budget, and it provides services in return, Mock said. About 70 percent of the center's current projects involve academic departments and other university entities, he said.

Each semester, Mock said between 10 and 15 students work as production crew members at the communications center. With K-STATE TV, Mock said the production staff also wants students to produce their own content.

Chris Jordan, senior in mass communications, said he has worked at the communications center since his freshman year. Jordan, who helps with audio and runs the video camera, said he thinks K-STATE TV will help viewers learn more about K-State.

"From a student standpoint, K-STATE TV really shows you what K-State can offer," Jordan said.

The communications center provides an opportunity for students to get involved, said Lindsey Friesen, senior in mass communications. Friesen said she has worked for three years at the center on various projects, including Spanish via Satellite, "Show K-State" and different campus-related assignments.

The center also reaches out to community members with special programming related to K-State, Friesen said.

"Adding more local shows will really increase viewer numbers, and I think get more on to the campus and to students," she said. "I think it's really great in what they're doing in trying to reach out."

FOOTBALL | Johnson, Patton do not quibble over RB duties

power. The Spartans trailed by three points prior to Freeman's 1-yard touchdown run with 1:26 remaining in the first half, which gave K-State a 17-7 lead at halftime.

"I thought it was anybody's to win going into the third quarter," San Jose State coach Dick Tomey said.

James Johnson and Deon Murphy would soon enough put an end to those thoughts. Johnson, who rushed only seven times for 14 yards last week against Auburn, gained 111 yards on 15 carries. His 4-yard touchdown run early in the fourth quarter gave K-State a 24-7 lead.

Whether Johnson will continue to get the bulk of the carries remains to be seen, but he said he and fellow running back Leon Patton (six rushes, 21 yards) are willing to share.

"Me and him are not selfish with each other; we just want to see each other do their best," Johnson said. "The coaches just felt I was in a groove tonight, so they gave me most of the carries."

Murphy, whose 15-yard touchdown reception in the first quarter helped K-State to a 10-0 lead, added another TD on the ground. He took a wide receiver reverse 21 yards — helped along by left tackle Alesana Alesana's downfield block — to put K-State up 34-7.

He finished with six catches for 72 yards, and totaled 188 all-purpose yards.

Nelson, meanwhile, made a bit of history. With his 11-yard reception in the third quarter, he moved into 10th-place on K-State's all-time receptions list.

As for the defense, it was on the field longer than Prince would have liked — 33 minutes, 9 seconds. The Wildcats allowed 20 first downs, five by penalty, and were unable to force a turnover.

But at the end of the night, the Wildcats (1-1) weren't consumed with some of the negatives. After all, they got what they wanted most — a win.

"It's not whether you have a good game or a bad game," Freeman said. "It's whether you win or lose. We got the job done tonight."

The rush to a solution

Tuttle Creek Dam undergoes quake stability process

By Amanda Keim
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tuttle Creek Dam is in the process of being stabilized because of the possibility of a moderate to large earthquake.

In order to secure the dam, the federal government is sponsoring a project under the supervision of the Army Corps of Engineers that not only will stabilize the foundation of the dam but also create supportive walls beneath the structure.

"What they're doing is stabilizing the dam with concrete so that it protects it from earthquakes and terrorist attacks," said Bob Strawn, city commissioner. "It is a dam stabilization project. The dam was built in the '50s, so it was getting some age on it, and it was time to visit the safety of the dam itself. Because we are in an earthquake area, it was important to get some concrete in."

If significant damage did occur, the lake could wash out the dam and would affect millions of Kansas citizens, he said.

"There are two million feet of water behind it," Strawn said. "If that dam were to spill, it would just be a catastrophic impact on eastern Manhattan - all of that area would be hit with flood water. You would have many people that would drown."

There have been more than 25 earthquakes within the Kansas borders in the past 135 years. When Tuttle Creek Dam was completed in 1962, the intake tower was put through and passed several earthquake resistance tests. During that time, however, a specific evaluation of the dam itself was not recognized. Since that time, the dam has been evaluated by world-wide experts using state-of-the-art techniques to predict the behavior of the dam during a major earthquake, according to the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers.

"We're designing the modifications to the dam to prevent failure from anything larger than a 5.7 magnitude earthquake," said Brian McNulty, operations manager for Tuttle Creek Lake. "From what we have determined from the experts, the largest earthquake we could possibly see in this area is a 6.6. Anything larger is unlikely."

An earthquake at a magnitude of 2.5 or less cannot be felt on the surface of the earth. Earthquakes ranging from 2.5 to 5.4 in magnitude are often felt but cause little to no damage. Slight damage to buildings and other structures might occur in an earthquake ranging in magnitude from 5.5 to 6.0 while earthquakes ranging from 6.1 to 6.9 might cause heavy damage in populated areas. Earthquakes of the greatest magnitude reach a level of 8.0 or more and can completely decimate communities, according to UPSeis, an educational Web site from Michigan Technological University.

The federal government is sponsoring the project that originally was budgeted at $200 million. However, it looks as though the project will come under budget due to the use of different materials and faster-paced work, Strawn said.

McNulty has been examining the project as it progresses.

Water flows quickly out the tubes of the Tuttle Creek Dam during the rain on Monday afternoon. The federal government is involved in a project that will stabilize the foundation of the dam and protect it from small to moderate size earthquakes.

Construction on stabilizing the dam is in progress in various parts of the south side, blocking off roads from people other than contractors.

WebMail password deadline tomorrow

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The deadline for K-State students and faculty to change their eID passwords is 11:59 p.m. Wednesday.

As of Monday afternoon, more than 16,000 students and faculty members still needed to change their passwords, said Rebecca Gould, director of the Information Technology Assistance Center. An e-mail reminder was sent to students and faculty who had not changed their passwords, Gould said.

Passwords cannot be reused within two years, and they must be significantly changed.

They also must have a minimum of seven characters and must contain characters from three of the following categories: uppercase letters, lowercase letters, numbers and special characters. Five different characters must compose the passwords, and it cannot be based on a computing ID, eID or a real name, Gould said.

If students and faculty members do not change their passwords, they will not have access to K-State Online, WebMail, KATS or HRIS Employee Self Service accounts.

Students and faculty members can contact the IT Help Desk at (785) 532-7722.

General says surge might end by 2008

By Mike Kelly
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The 30,000 U.S. troops dispatched in January could come home as soon as next July, but talks of further troop withdrawal should wait until March, the top U.S. general in Iraq told Congress on Monday.

Gen. David Petraeus, the head of Multinational Forces in Iraq, testified with U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Ryan Crocker in front of a joint hearing of Congress. Petraeus predicted a drawback of U.S. troops in Iraq by next summer to pre-January surge levels, but he would not offer numbers beyond July.

"Our experience in Iraq has repeatedly shown that projecting too far into the future is not just difficult, it can be misleading and even hazardous," Petraeus said at a joint hearing of the House Armed Services and Foreign Relations committees. "The events of the past six months underscore that point."

Petraeus said the total number of troops to be withdrawn by next summer - one Marine expeditionary unit, two Marine battalions and five Army brigades - is a substantial withdrawal that would allow the remaining forces to continue operational and strategic considerations, including fighting off al-Qaida in Iraq and Iranian militia extremists.

However, Petraeus warned that a quick departure from Iraq would allow al-Qaida in Iraq to regain its faltering foothold and would leave instability in many areas that are now achieving sustainable security.

Congressman Moran visits Ag Policy course, discusses current ag issues Surprising friend Barry Flinchbaugh, professor of agricultural economics, Rep. Jerry Moran, R-Kan., attended his Agricultural Policy class Monday afternoon in Cardwell Hall. Moran attended the class without Flinchbaugh's knowledge, but spoke up by asking a question during the middle of class.

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

He sat in the middle of the lecture hall in a purple K-State polo shirt and K-State hat. Whispers circulated throughout the classroom.

"There's Congressman Moran!"

Rep. Jerry Moran, R-Kan., leaned his elbows on his desk like the other students and listened to Barry Flinchbaugh, professor of agricultural economics, lecture to his Agricultural Policy students Monday afternoon in Cardwell Hall.

The class started at 2:30 p.m. At 3, Moran raised his hand to ask a question regarding the graded quizzes that Flinchbaugh had returned to his students.

"If you were a better teacher, would they get better scores?"

Flinchbaugh, taken by surprise, said an expletive and shook his head. It was the second year that Moran had surprised his friend by showing up unannounced during a lecture.

Most representatives on the House Rules and Appropriations committees are not from farm or agriculture-based states, Moran said. He specifically mentioned Rep. Rosa DeLauro, D-Conn., who is the chair of the Agriculture Subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee based on her seniority in Congress. DeLauro asked Moran to educate her on what farmers do, and he has since brought her to Kansas to explain farmers' roles.

"My goal from day one in Congress has been to see if there is any future in the places you and I call home," Moran said.

Moran, who has served in Congress since 1997, is a senior member of the House Agriculture Committee and a ranking member of the Subcommittee on General Farm Commodities and Risk Management. He represents the "Big First" Congressional District, which includes 69 of the 105 Kansas counties and covers more than 57,000 square miles.

Flinchbaugh ended the class with an invitation for Moran to guest

FROM THE ARCHIVES

K-State's first volleyball team – the Wildkittens – began after a new faculty member encouraged the start of the popular West Coast sport at the university. The picture of the first team appeared in the 1975 Royal Purple yearbook.

UNIVERSITY ARCHIVES

Oregon coach introduced volleyball at K-State

The K-State Wildkittens began competing more than 30 years ago when the idea of volleyball being a sport started catching on in the Midwest. In 1974, an addition to the K-State faculty used his influence to start the first K-State volleyball team. The following is an article taken from the Sept. 18, 1974, edition of the K-State Collegian.

ENTHUSIAST WANTS POWER VOLLEYBALL TO BE K-STATE'S NEWEST MINOR SPORT

By Ted Ludlum
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The West Coast has gained the reputation of starting fads, which slowly spread across the nation until the entire land is engulfed in its mania.

One such fad currently catching along the West Coast is volleyball. Not the brand of volleyball played at picnics, but the kind played at the international level. This brand of volleyball is known as power volleyball.

Before a fad can catch on, it usually needs some fans to spread its popularity and create enthusiasm for it.

For power volleyball, one such man trying to create interest is Richard Cox, a new member of the Department of Health, Physical Education and Recreation.

Having just arrived from the University of Oregon, Cox's background in volleyball is extensive.

Cox participated in five national volleyball championships since 1965 and coached in two of these.

During this time he was selected as a member of two all-Northwest teams. Having conducted numerous volleyball teaching programs at Oregon from 1972 to 1974, Cox has an administrative end of volleyball.

With this background Cox is now interested in starting a power volleyball organization at K-State.

"The situation now is that I'm a new faculty member with a pretty good volleyball background.

"I realize that volleyball isn't very big in the Plains States, so I'd be willing to volunteer my time and services as a faculty adviser to form a volleyball team. As long as I'm here I feel I should make use of this skill and help others," Cox said.

Besides the low interest that is presently shown toward volleyball, Cox sees two other difficulties to deal with if a volleyball organization is to be successful.

"The availability of facilities is very minimal," Cox said. "There is also a problem in financing. I believe that the Recreational Services will provide some of the funds, but more will be needed."

Cox stressed that since the team would operate as a club or organization separate from the university, it would not receive any funds from K-State.

Also by being separate from the school, graduate students will be eligible to join the team.

Playing in open tournaments in Wichita, Kansas City and Omaha, Neb., Cox believes a team with at least 14 members could be formed as late as November and still take part in the upcoming season, which runs December through April.

"Volleyball here is associated with picnics.

"It is really in a dwarf stage here. In Europe, the best athletes are involved in the volleyball program.

"The sport is growing in interest and I'd like to help it grow here at K-State," Cox said.

UPC's Awareness Week to promote upcoming events

By Jenna Scavuzzo
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Union Program Council is striving to get its name heard on campus this week.

K-State students continuously and actively attempt to provide their input toward the activities they want to experience in the K-State Student Union, said Ben Hopper, UPC program adviser.

Each semester, the UPC Entertainment Committee schedules one nationally known entertainer. In the past, the committee has brought in entertainers like Lily Tomlin, Jimmy Buffett, Steve Martin, Tracy Morgan and Michael Ian Black. This semester, K-State students have started a Facebook.com group and poll on the UPC Web site dedicated toward their hopes of comedian Will Ferrell performing at K-State.

"We have talked to Will Ferrell's agent," Hopper said. "He will be touring six or seven schools this year. It would be great if he selects us as one of his schools to tour, but if not, we can easily find another great performer."

UPC has coordinated other events throughout the year as well – this week being an important one in its quest to raise awareness for UPC and its offerings. Through Sunday, the council is promoting UPC Awareness Week. The week will create campus awareness of the council's services by providing student-oriented activities, Hopper said.

Because the council provides more than 150 entertainment, cultural, recreational and educational programs each year, Awareness Week was created to showcase its leadership status among K-State student organizations, Hopper said. It shows K-State students the opportunities and experiences UPC can provide them, Hopper said.

Various giveaways and contests also are planned to take place during the week, Hopper said.

"There is a lot planned, and it should showcase the UPC in a positive way," said UPC manager and assistant director Beth Bailey.

"It will provide a great opportunity to help students become involved on campus and in our events, as well take advantage of the constant activity and many amenities provided by the Union. Students should help us the choose events they want to see promoted here."

UPC members think if they raise awareness of the UPC events to K-State students through the Union Program Awareness Week, the week will be considered successful, said Chris Jones, UPC Forum Committee co-chair.

"We grade the week's success through the amount of participation and enjoyment of K-State's students toward our planned events," Jones said. "We go through and evaluate how our events went, which helps us set goals and figure out which events we want to put on for the rest of the semester."

The eight committees are composed of 20 student leaders, 40 committee members and five advisers. Meetings for students involved with or wanting to join UPC take place at 5:30 p.m. Tuesdays in Union Station.

"We are always looking for more students to get involved in such a great organization," Hopper said. "It's a great way to feel connected and be involved in the university while being able to participate in cool events and develop better leadership opportunities."

Creeping in Illegal immigrants bring diseases into States

As our nation slowly is overrun by illegal immigrants, we must realize there are not just societal and economic issues, but medical concerns as well.

It has become second nature for people to sit back and make justifications for allowing illegal immigration. However, unless they acknowledge the consequences they are not likely to understand its full implications.

Investor's Business Daily reported on Aug. 29, that Francisco Santos, an illegal immigrant, was arrested at Gwinnett Medical Center on Aug. 24 when he refused treatment for an active case of contagious tuberculosis and threatened to leave the hospital and return to Mexico.

Santos will get his wish when Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents deport him back home to receive medical help there, instead of taxing our services.

Unfortunately, cases like Santos' are not random occurrences. A tuberculosis outbreak involving 131 immigrants occurred at a South Carolina poultry plant just a few weeks ago.

According to webmd.com, tuberculosis is a highly contagious viral infection spread through air particles by an infected person when he or she sneezes, coughs or spits.

Frontpagemagazine.com reported Aug. 17, "It is estimated that each person infected with TB will infect 10 others."

This is a huge biological threat to the citizens of the United States. New strains of tuberculosis that are resistant to drug treatment have developed, and research by the Indiana University of Medicine affirmed it was introduced into the United States by Mexican Nationals.

Citizens of the United States should be rightfully concerned with the alarming rate at which infected immigrants, who have not gone through any medical screening processes, are coming into this country. According to a Pew Hispanic Report, illegal immigrants make up for almost 30 percent of the foreign-population inside the United States.

Last year, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention released a report titled "Trends in Tuberculosis Incidence - United States" saying the number of tuberculosis cases among foreign-born persons in the US increased in 2006, and approximately half came from five countries, Mexico being the leader with 1,912 reported cases.

Considering the United States shares a border with Mexico, it would be in our best interest to stop any miscreants from coming into the country and unabashedly jeopardizing our health.

Matt Hayes, professor at Berkeley College and author of "The New Immigration Law and Practice," said in response to the problem, "Not one of them encounters immigration authorities, let alone BCIS civil surgeons whose job it is to test immigrants for communicable diseases."

The evidence shows the relative costs of harboring between 8 and 15 million illegal immigrants outweighs the "benefits" that illegal-immigrant sympathizers fabricate.

If ever there was a time to crack down on illegal immigration it would be now before a pandemic arises. We must not brush off this dire problem with anecdotes about the tough life of an illegal immigrant.

If the United States wants to continue to be a strong prosperous nation, we need to learn to control the borders so as to protect our country from disease. The longer we continue to blatantly ignore problems, the worse the repercussions.

TO THE POINT

Spears has lost her touch

Sunday night saw Britney Spears make another futile attempt to return to show business.

The platform she chose to return on? The MTV Video Music awards.

While her children were heaven knows where and with heaven knows who, Britney decided to dance, sing and shove herself into a two piece outfit. All at the same time.

It's not the fact she was wearing the outfit or the fact that she was lip-syncing worse than Milli Vanilli - the thing that struck the audience and TV viewers more than anything was how far Britney has fallen from where she used to be.

Britney had a great childhood career on the Disney Channel's "Mickey Mouse Club" and managed to pull that momentum into an even more successful career as a teenager and young adult.

After taking a few years off, getting married twice, having two kids, shaving her head, and driving with a baby in her lap, it stands to reason that the time was right for a comeback.

Not an acoustic tour comeback complete with coffee shop sets and candle light.

The type of comeback that includes the opening performance at one of the biggest entertainment events of the year.

After the great failing that was her "show," the only thing left for her to do is invest in a multi-acre estate with an amusement park, buy some exotic animals and get involved in more scandals.

Isn't Neverland Ranch for sale?

Grammar not as large a focus in schools as it should be Grammar is the basis of our language. Nouns, verbs, adjectives, adverbs and all those grammatical terms are building blocks of what we say and write. Yet many people don't know even simple grammar rules.

Most children start to learn grammar early in grade school. Many would think students would have a better grasp of grammar judging by how much younger children talk.

As students get older, the less teachers and instructors care about grammar. According to a study from the ACT National Curriculum Survey, only 10 percent of teachers think basic grammar is the most important skill to teach, compared with 35 percent of college professors.

In the study, high-school teachers thought writing effective introductions and conclusions were the important parts of writing, while college professors ranked it the 30th most important.

Just like multiplication tables and basic U.S. history, grammar isn't being taught from a young age over and over.

Teachers need to teach grammar again because schools are not doing a decent job of teaching students at all levels.

According to the ACT study, 76 percent of teachers thought their state English standards adequately prepared students for college. Only 33 percent of college professors agreed.

Teachers put the wrong emphasis on English skills. Instead of making sure students know the basics of a sentence, teachers force their students to write reports, essays and long papers.

If a teacher applied this same logic to teaching math, after learning his multiplication tables, little Johnny would be forced to solve quadratic equations.

Even in college, grammar is not emphasized. At K-State, there are no grammar classes for English majors or general students. Just like in high school, teachers assume students have been taught essential grammar rules.

We have all been in a class where the teacher emphasizes proper grammar. Several people struggle with the content, which includes basic grammar rules most students learned in fifth grade.

So what's the problem with poor grammar? People have gotten along fine without proper grammar, and as long as they understand what you're talking about then it's fine. Right?

Making grammar mistakes is OK. I don't know several grammar rules and make mistakes all the time, but not because I'm too lazy to follow the rules.

Through text messages, e-mails and everyday conversations, people habitually have disregarded basic grammar for messaging shortcuts.

Shortcuts like writing "2morrow" instead of tomorrow and "how r u?" and phrases like "lol" and "rofl" are just some of many abuses proliferating into formal interactions.

These messages are acceptable when e-mailing a buddy, but it probably wouldn't be great to say "idk" when a boss asks a question.

I find it humorous when people, who probably know few grammar rules, want English to be the official language. Several counties in Virginia and other states already have passed legislation to make it the official language.

Maybe we should learn our language well before we tell other citizens that they must speak it.

Teaching starts in grade school and it should continue through high school, college and beyond. English is a difficult language to learn, and it definitely takes more than a few lessons from a workbook every school year to understand.

Celebrities' antics provide new form of entertainment

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

MTV's annual awards show – the Video Music Awards – took place Sunday night in Las Vegas and provided us all with more reasons to hate famous people.

KID ROCK VS. TOMMY LEE

According to CNN, Pamela Anderson's former husbands Kid Rock and Tommy Lee exchanged blows after getting into a verbal fight with one another. Lee verbally assaulted Rock when Rock walked over to the table the drummer was sitting at to talk to rap mogul Diddy. Rock and Diddy were slated to appear later in the show to present the final award of the night.

It is unclear what Lee said to Rock, but Lee's words drove Rock to slap Lee in the face.

After being punched, Lee tried to fight back, but Rock hit him in the face. Before the fight escalated any further, security broke the two men apart and escorted them out of the venue. Rock did not present the award later in the evening.

Rock was not arrested or detained, but was issued a summons to appear later in the year at a Las Vegas court. The maximum penalty for the incident is $500 and six months in jail.

BRITNEY'S ATTEMPT WEAK

Another incident started when Britney Spears decided to give her career another shot. In the opening performance of the 2007 VMAs, Spears performed "Gimme More." Spears' performance, along with the rest of the VMAs, can be viewed in its entirety at MTV.com.

Spears was dressed in a two-piece, bikini-style outfit, and to make matters worse, replacing the performer's former six-pack abs was a slight bulge that has no business being showcased the way it was.

The "singing" was a different story altogether. Rather than actually singing along to the music, Spears lip-synched the entire song – and at points – stopped moving her lips while the music continued to play.

The biggest disappointment from the "performance" was the poor attempt Spears made at dancing.

Forgetting the amazing routines she has been known to perform, Spears decided to use moves usually taught to first-year dance students. The most complex move she performed was the vertical worm, when she gyrated her body up and down.

The overall impression of the performance was that Spears should have just stayed in the trailer.

KANYE PITCHES FIT

Deciding to end the show with a kick, Kanye West also got in on the action.

According to the Associated Press, after failing to win a single VMA for the second year in a row, West let out his frustration by vowing never to work with MTV again. West was nominated for awards in five categories, including Male Artist of the Year.

"That's two years in a row, man ... give a black man a chance," West said to reporters.

The rapper's latest outburst came two days before the his new album, "Graduation," was set to hit stores.

West also is feuding with rapper Curtis "50 Cent" Jackson.

Jackson has claimed he no longer will release solo albums if "Graduation" outsells his latest release, "Curtis."

Band's musicianship remains consistent after release of 3rd album

Interpol "Our Love to Admire"

★★★★☆

Album review by Mark Sibilla

Being the fan of a band is similar to being in a serious long-term relationship.

In both scenarios, everyone goes through times when things are excellent, as every breath you take is spent praising your lover's name – while some days you want as little to do with the band as possible.

And as with all relationships, both sides must grow together. It is often imperative that a band grows, matures and changes its sound in order to keep the relationship with the listener fresh, unpredictable and new. If the band fails to do that, it can quickly lose its fan-base and critical acclaim.

I first met the New York City quartet, Interpol, in 2002 with its debut album "Turn on the Bright Lights." It was an excellent reimagining of the dreary post-punk sound pioneered by bands like Joy Division and Echo and the Bunnymen, and it remains one of the best albums of this decade.

Interpol's follow-up album, "Antics," was released in 2004; it wasn't much of a departure from its predecessor, but it demonstrated the band's growth as musicians. "Antics" also proved Interpol was still the best band in a sea of imitators that flooded onto the market after Interpol (and its sound) gained notoriety.

Now it is 2007, and my relationship with Interpol is going on five years.

"Our Love to Admire," the band's third album – and first for major label Capitol Records – seems to sound like a band that is unsure of how it should evolve musically.

Interpol uses many of the same techniques it has on previous albums (see single "The Heinrich Maneuver"), but by now, those tricks are beginning to wear thin. The very things that made Interpol charming are now beginning to grate, and

I wonder if the band has exhausted any viable ideas. Interpol's songs are still full of down-strummed guitar lines, a heavy reliance on the rhythm section and lead singer Paul Banks' arcane poetry.

However, Interpol is very consistent: the by-the-numbers songs are quite good technically – the band does what it knows how to do well – and there are enough new ideas to keep the album interesting.

The album opens, as all Interpol albums have, with a grand opening statement, and on this album it is the majestic "Pioneer to the Falls."

It starts with a simple, jangly guitar line by Daniel Kessler before Banks enters with some of the most beautiful singing of his career. Then the booming combination of Carlos D's bass and Sam Fogarino's kick-drum completes the song, as the ballad grandly plods along on the excellent interaction between the four members.

By the second song, "No I in Threesome," the band's slightly updated sound becomes more salient. The most obvious change is in the production. The problem is that Banks' vocals and Kessler's guitar are so high in the mix that the rhythm section becomes lost and is relegated to the background. This is particularly detrimental for two reasons.

First, the band loses its signature sound with the less defined bass and drums. Second, Paul Banks can have some real lyrical clunkers. At best, his lyrics are cryptic and mysterious, but at worst, they sound like bad seventh-grade poetry. Without the prominent rhythm section, when Banks lets loose a lyrical bomb, it is naked – the bass and drums no longer create an atmosphere that let even the most obtuse lines sound mystifying.

The band also has begun to write songs on keyboard and piano. It is good to hear the inclusion of these new instruments, but many times the piano lines can't be heard through the sound of the rest of the band. One significant example is the beautiful ballad "Rest My Chemistry." I didn't even realize there was piano until I listened to the song on headphones. The track would have been much more poignant had the keyboard countermelody been more prominent.

Interpol shines during the final two tracks of the album. Penultimate track, "Wrecking Ball," is a subdued song that slowly builds to a climax before fading out with gently strummed guitar, restrained orchestral flourishes and subtle backwards-looped vocals.

"The Lighthouse" is perhaps the best track on the album. It consists solely of guitar strumming that ebbs and flows while Banks sings about the tide hitting the shores of a beach below a lighthouse. It is the best composed song that Interpol has perhaps ever created – its atmospherics perfectly echo and supplement the lyrics. The song is absolutely heart wrenching.

"Our Love to Admire" is Remake revives western genre

"3:10 to Yuma"

★★★★☆

Movie review by Brendan Praeger

The western genre has been dead for a while.

The tales of outlaws robbing banks, drinking whiskey and fighting Indians seem to have fallen off since John Wayne died and Clint Eastwood stepped behind the camera. Sure, movies like "Wild Wild West" and "American Outlaws" have tried to keep the genre alive, but they were really just spitting on the grave of a once great genre.

Now, though, "3:10 to Yuma," director James Mangold's follow-up to the excellent Johnny Cash biopic "Walk the Line," finally provides the contemporary fix that western fans need.

I can't exactly praise Mangold for creating something fresh and original. Based on an Elmore Leonard short story, "3:10 to Yuma" is a remake of a 1957 film starring Glenn Ford. It separates itself from other recent remakes by not relying on the popularity of the original to sell tickets. I've never seen the original film, but if it achieved even half of the intensity of its remake, it's worth checking out.

The film, starring Russell Crowe ("Gladiator") and Christian Bale ("Batman Begins"), two of Hollywood's most reliable stars, succeeds by keeping things simple.

In order to earn enough, Dan Evans (Bale), offers to help a group of lawmen put outlaw Ben Wade (Crowe) on a train to Yuma prison. Wade's gang tries to rescue its ruthless leader in a series of old-fashioned gunfights.

The supporting cast is excellent as well. Dallas Roberts ("Walk the Line") steals scenes as the railroad businessman, and Alan Tudyk ("Serenity") is a veterinarian who quickly learns how to remove bullets from his friends. Luke Wilson even makes an appearance as a railroad worker eager to torture Ben Wade for killing his brother.

From the first stage-coach robbery featuring an old-school Gatling gun to the climactic gunfight in the dusty streets surrounding a train station, the film's intensity never lets up, and things never get too predictable.

There are enough bullets to please action fans, enough tension to please drama fans, and for the first time in more than a decade, Western fans will find themselves leaving the theater happy.

INTERPOL

not a bad album – it is simply Interpol's weakest offering to date with a couple of mediocre songs mixed with plenty of good and a few great tracks. The album offers enough interesting moments to warrant keeping my relationship with the band steady. It will be up to the future to determine how closely I follow Interpol – if the band continues to do little to change its sound, it might be time for me to abandon the band, but "Our Love to Admire" offers enough solid moments to justify staying with Interpol for the time being.

Devotion has its costs

When your favorite NFL team loses a game, especially its season opener, there's really no wrong way to react.

Trust me on this one. Take no shame in kicking around a helpless lawn chair in the back yard of your home. Feel no remorse, no sympathy, for that poor computer desk that now sits in three pieces, its remains scattered across your bedroom floor. And when you smack your right forearm so hard against a door frame that you momentarily lose feeling in your fingers, shake it off.

Sports are supposed to be fun, right?

If you were a Kansas City Chiefs fan on Sunday, you probably didn't have much fun. In fact, your experience might have been so bad that it prompted you to pick a new team. I can't say I'd blame you. There are 31 other teams in the NFL, and none of them are coached by Herman Edwards.

But if you were at least willing to give the Chiefs a legitimate chance, if you were comfortable with flicking on the television in hopes that they might surprise you, then you certainly aren't the most pathetic fan in America. No, I think we've already found our winner for that prize.

His name is "frikidanno," an eBay user who, after being a Cleveland Browns fan for 35 years, decided he'd finally had enough. On Aug. 31, Danno, as we'll call him, put up a listing on eBay auctioning off his fan allegiance.

He said he's willing to root for any team except for the Dallas Cowboys. The highest bidder, according to the listing, will receive his "fandom" for one year with an option to renew once the season is over. He makes all sorts of promises.

Sound crazy? Well, Danno is serious.

He uses words like "karma" and "positive thinking," going so far as to suggest his simple presence might mean a Super Bowl appearance.

People, including yours truly, have encouraged him, by placing bids on his services. At last check, there were 38 bids totaling $72.

However, I'm afraid the winning bidder will be in for a disturbing surprise. It simply won't be possible for Danno to genuinely root for another team, not when his loyalty to the Browns spans four decades.

I sent Danno a private message, wishing him luck and telling him I hope he's able to pull through his fan crisis. But shortly after sending the message, I began thinking about his situation some more.

What if he's able to break ties with the team that has seemingly given him so much grief through the years? What if he's able to rid himself of the pain, the agony, that's inevitable at the turn of every calendar year? Wouldn't that be something?

Imagine the feeling of never having to suffer through a bad Sunday again. Wouldn't that be incredible?

I plan on following up with Danno in the months ahead, just to see if he's having withdrawals. I'd also like to know if he's managed to keep a clean conscience.

If his plan ends up working, if he's able to have success with it and rid himself of his bad allegiance, maybe I'll find myself in the same position a year from now, selling my rights on eBay. We'll start the bidding at $45. The rest will be history.

Hopefully Patriots fans have thick pocket books.

Moore out for rest of season

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State outside linebacker Antwon Moore will miss the rest of the season with an apparent knee injury suffered Saturday against San Jose State.

Moore, a converted defensive back from Ponca City, Okla., was injured in the first quarter after sacking Spartans quarterback Adam Tafralis.

"Antwon's brought a lot of energy to us," said coach Ron Prince. "He had a big role defensively. This year, we expanded his role. We could all see that he played with a certain speed. We'll miss him, no question."

Last season, Moore accumulated 26 tackles, including 4.5 tackles-for-loss and two sacks. He had five tackles and two sacks through two games this season.

Middle linebacker Justin Roland, who has been Moore's teammate since they were in
